Iran must be stopped

We are now well into the 21st century, with human beings pushing tentatively, if not always humbly, ever forward into the frontiers of science, seeking and unlocking more of the mysteries of humanity's existence and place on earth; with nations and governments joining together to ease massive, calamitous human suffering caused by natural and other disasters; with trans-national, non-governmental agencies and individuals sharing information, knowledge and technology to try to defeat catastrophic common threats of pandemic and disease. All of this seems to have escaped the notice of the president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

How else to explain his particular fixation on dragging his country back into the darkest days of the Middle Ages when ignorance, superstition and hatred were rampant?

When he proclaimed last week for the whole world to see and hear, before the rolling television cameras of the Iranian state broadcasting authority, that the Jewish state should be "wiped off the map," he also effectively told the world that he would tolerate not even the slightest ray of enlightenment or modern advancement shining upon his people. That his opinion was expressed at a conference dedicated to bringing about a "World Without Zionism" and that he reiterated his call for Israel's annihilation two days later saying Israel was "a blot which must be erased from the map", leave no doubt that the Iranian president was not merely musing, but rather expressing his fervent hopes and beliefs.

The fact that the United Nations Security Council unanimously condemned the Iranian government for its call to genocide was impressive. The fact, too, that western nations rebuked the Iranian president so vociferously and so unambiguously immediately after he uttered his remarks last Wednesday was heartening.

But the condemnations and the rebukes, however laudatory, are not sufficient. The government of Iran is a rogue regime. It inspires, protects, supports and funds terrorists. It has feverish aspirations to urgently acquire a nuclear warhead. And it has the military capability to send its missiles into Israel, Saudi Arabia, and even as far as Europe. It must be prevented from acquiring that nuclear capability, lest it be able to match murderous means with murderous aims. This is an imperative priority of western nations. If the West fails, however, no one should be surprised if the government of Israel steels itself for the life-saving task.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call last week was a shocking variation and wishful echo of the very same speech delivered by Adolf Hitler some 70 years ago. Though Hitler's threats were aimed first and foremost at the Jews, their destructive reach, as we know, extended far beyond. They destroyed the lives of some 50 million people and ruined the lives of hundreds of millions more.

World, be warned. Iran must be stopped.

Get legislation won't change

Some people mistakenly think that our very successful get law in Ontario is kaput. Legally speaking, I can assure everyone that such observations are utter nonsense. In "Secular courts, Jewish courts and agunot," (CJN, Oct. 20), Sara Horowitz mistakenly wrote that Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty will change the get law. The article "Quebec appeal court overturns precedent-setting get order," (CJN, Oct 6) suggested it was endangered, quoting Court of Appeal Justice Allan Hilton that the law was "impugned" and limited in its application.

First, Hilton clearly pronounced that the constitutional validity of the get legislation was not even before the court. The term "impugned" was lifted out of context. The Quebec Court of Appeal only ruled that the law prohibited monetary damages. (Ontario law may well provide a different result.) But wake up everyone! The statute never provided for that remedy anyway. The get law was therefore not "impugned" in the slightest.

Hilton's does make purely "incidental" remarks that appear to limit the use of the get law unless the spouse withholding the get first files a pre-trial proceeding (called a motion.) Being "incidental" remarks (called "obiter"), they do not bind other courts. Moreover, Hilton so blatantly misread the plain wording of the statute that these remarks will not likely be followed.

Secondly, McGuinty only announced that he would ban the Ontario courts from enforcing any rulings of religious courts that arbitrate disputes. He did not, however, announce a law to "ban" rabbis from supervising religious divorces or marriages. In Ontario, there are two kinds of Jewish courts: Divorce courts that only supervise divorce (the "get") and do not arbitrate disputes, and courts of mediation/arbitration, to which McGuinty was likely referring. Moreover, the get law has absolutely nothing to do with the religious arbitration of disputes. Indeed, it does the opposite: the Ontario court refuses any legal remedies to a spouse until he/she consents to a get. After he/she does so, he/she is then free to resubmit legal claims or defences only to the Ontario court.

Accordingly, McGuinty's announcement should have no impact whatsoever on the get law. In any event, the Ontario Legislature only has the power to amend the provincial get law under Ontario's Family Law Act. McGuinty has no power to amend the Federal Divorce Act. When I invented the get law in 1985, I designed it to be part of both acts. Section 21.1 of the Federal Divorce Act, the more important get law, would survive irrespective of the premier's plans.

Last week, Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, called for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and said a new wave of Palestinian attacks will destroy the Jewish state. He was speaking to students at an Iranian government-supported conference in Tehran called "The World Without Zionism."

As a civilization, Iran reached its zenith under Cyrus some 2,600 years ago. The present regime is arguably among the most corrupt, xenophobic, misogynist, violent and backward on the planet.

Has Iran no domestic problems that beg for solutions? Improvements in freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and freedom from arrest and detention, perhaps? Freedom of sexual orientation and equal rights for women, perhaps? Education that extends beyond the hate-filled swill that emanates from its schools?

A "World Without Zionism" is no different than the Nazi "Final Solution." They are one and the same. Nations of this Earth have an obligation to defeat the evil that is Iran.

'World without Zionism' conference (2)

At a conference titled "The World Without Zionism," Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying that "any [Islamic leader] who recognizes the Zionist regime means he is acknowledging the surrender and defeat of the Islamic world." In his statement, Ahmadinejad is reaffirming the "three nos'" dictum adopted at the Sept. 1, 1967, Khartoum Arab Summit: "No peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with Israel." Both proclamations are consonant and are rooted in the extremist Wahhabi theology that teaches that Israel symbolizes a breach in God's law and an obstruction to the quest for Islamic regional hegemony.

Yitzhak Rabin remembered – by a neighbour

By JUDIE ORON

World War II has given Jews more than the usual share of anniversaries to mourn. Other sad days have accumulated since then. To paraphrase a son of mine, if we're not careful there may not be any days in the calendar year that don't involve grieving. To prove his point, and difficult as it is to believe, it is the 10th anniversary of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination – on 11 Cheshvan in the Hebrew calendar and Nov. 4 in the general calendar.

It was July of 1992 when my family moved from a small village outside of Jerusalem to Tel Aviv and we first encountered the former prime minister.

I had been to look at a rental apartment in the posh suburb of Ramat Aviv in the middle of a bright Middle Eastern day. But apartments were hard to come by and the family's sleepy teenager was not very obliging. He grudgingly allowed me to inspect the flat with all the shutters closed. It would do, I thought, since it was only going to be for a year or so. I went back home to start packing.

A month later, my family pulled up to the front door, with the moving truck hard on our heels. We hurried to open all the shutters and windows and the kids spread out to choose bedrooms.

"Mom, come see, it's Rabin and he's in his underwear – he's waving at me!" my younger son yelled excitedly. Tramping into the bedroom in question, there, I did in fact see Rabin and he was smiling at all of us. The room that quickly became Jonathan's was straight across the narrow street from the prime minister's and so began a three-year relationship that ended with Rabin's assassination.

We soon discovered that it is impossible to live across the street from the prime minister of Israel without it affecting your life in a multiplicity of ways. My first unpleasant shock occurred when I went downstairs the next morning and had a look at my car – a dusty, bottle-green, ancient thing. Between the kids and the dog, it was generally pretty messy and dirty, but this morning it looked more than usually distressed. The glove compartment was empty and open, its contents strewn on the floor and on top of a heap of detritus haphazardly strewn on the front seat was a small handwritten sign on some sort of official paper that said, "Police security, sorry." This started happening fairly regularly, and after consulting with the neighbours about such matters, we soon got used to it.

I learned to park my car well out of range of the house for another reason, though. At least once a week there was a bomb threat, a demonstration, an official party at the prime minister's house or some other reason why my car and those of my neighbours would be stuck behind barricades. "Nope," we'd be told, "can't get your car out for another few hours." OK, kids, I'd sigh resignedly, we're taking the bus again today.

But to get back to my "relationship" with the Rabins. I could not help but be aware of the movements of my famous neighbours. I watched them and their guests move about the rooms that faced our apartment and tracked them during the times they spent outdoors on their patio. You can imagine how surprised I was to find, soon after we moved in, that they were watching us as well.

I am a tapestry weaver, and after unpacking most of the boxes, I eventually set up my upright loom on the balcony of the apartment. I would fling open the shutters, slide them aside and start warping, then weaving some landscape or other. I soon discovered that both Rabins, either together or separately, would be watching my landscape's snail-paced progress and that they would even punctuate their approval by a thumb's up, a nod or even a wave of the hand, to which I would delightedly reply. It didn't seem strange at the time to be grinning like an idiot across the way at the prime minister or Leah. I would point to the weaving and make a rocking movement of my hand, indicating that I wasn't totally happy with the progress of the opus. They would indicate approval by nodding their heads quite vigorously and then the parties on both sides of the street would go back to their business.

It was about a year after we moved in that the protesters began to camp out in the park outside my bedroom window. I was startled one evening to hear, loud and clear, the much-amplified voice of Rabin screaming, "We will never come down from Ramat Hagolan…" I rushed over to the window but saw no sign of the man. The noise was coming from loudspeakers parked outside my other window, which overlooked a small park. There I saw a large number of protesters, who appeared to be camped out in the park.

Those protesters stayed in the park with few breaks for nearly two years. The demonstration went from small and friendly to loud, large and increasingly ominous. As the peace talks progressed, the political situation became increasingly tense and the mood outside my window became more and more threatening. "Rabin's a terrorist," some shouted. Then, "Rabin's a traitor," became the mantra. One heard on the news that certain rabbis had even suggested that Rabin might die before evacuations could take place.

Through all this, the loudspeakers continued to play over and over that one sentence of Rabin's about never leaving the Golan Heights. Sightings of the couple on their balcony or through the windows became more and more rare. Gone was the informal camaraderie of non-verbal communications across the street, which was by now constantly barricaded and policed. My car was no longer being inspected, at least, but by then I was rarely parking it anywhere near the house.

One day during that period I was sitting in my living room when I watched my front-door handle being turned and in a flash my dog was leaping at the door. I opened it and then the dog chased someone down eight flights of stairs in record time. Following the incident, I duly reported to Rabin's security team what had happened. It was more than likely a burglary attempt, I thought, but just in case. There had been a few attempts in the last months to break the lock leading to the rooftop in our building and I thought it might be protesters trying to hang a sign.

The guards were polite but not terribly interested. It occurred to me for the first time that all those threats against Rabin might have implications for my family since we were so strategically placed opposite their apartment. Most people told me I was exaggerating, and when on my next walk I talked to the security guards again and was not given much encouragement, I simply went on with my life and ignored the protesters and the loudspeakers as best I could.

Days later, Rabin was assassinated and the street was full of mourners, candles and exalted visitors. Even Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat came to call on Leah. He waved to the mourners as he exited his vehicle, but I was not cheered. Rabin was dead and it seemed quite clear, the peace was dead as well.

A news broadcast in the days following the assassination reported that there had been a plan to shoot Rabin from a neighbouring apartment. That caused a ripple of uneasiness in our family but after all, we reasoned, the worst had already happened and not in our building, but in the centre of Tel Aviv.

Mourners streamed to the house across from ours, the protesters disappeared and you could barely get to the sidewalk as you picked your way among the people, candles, flowers and hand-made signs. The air was cloudy from the smoke of mourning candles and there was a hush over the neighbourhood. The deep voice of Rabin vowing never to leave the Golan Heights was silenced, not by an electrical short but by an assassin's bullet. The park was cleaned up eventually, and it was then possible to get one's car out of the parking area with absolutely no interference. The windows opposite mine were no longer filled with friendly neighbours and quirky, non-verbal conversations.

Ten years on, peace proposals are still tabled. And once again, calls of "traitor" and worse have been heard, often, surprisingly, from some of Israel's most exalted rabbis. And again, these epithets are being focused at our prime minister, whose schedule, we are told, is not so much event-driven as decided by security concerns.

Many things have changed since that autumn leading up to Rabin's death. Some things have not. Familiar echoes from that time strike a fearful chord in the family that lived across the way. One thing we are hoping, that we have learned from the past and that, above all, Israel's future will not hold another political assassination, not another anniversary to mourn.

Surviving Thanksgiving

Situated between Canadian Thanksgiving (October) and American Thanksgiving (November), the Jewish holiday Sukkot seems culturally appropriate. It fits the harvest themes of these secular holidays. By using palm leaves and a citron– the traditional lulav and etrog– as well as through the act of eating outdoors in Sukkah booths (a crazy custom given Canadian weather patterns), this holiday emphasizes the agricultural patterns of our Middle Eastern ancestors and celebrates the bountiful gifts of God.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Many civilizations celebrate the harvest and many have thanksgiving feasts. Their diversity is striking. Notably, the American and Canadian traditions differ in intensity and national importance. Thanksgiving in the United States is the most travelled day, topping even Christmas and New Year's. What distinguishes the Jewish one? We could easily top many others by noting the intensity of our celebrations. Sukkot lasts eight days – nine days outside of Israel.

Thankfully, the holiday season is now over and we can proudly say we survived. Between synagogue, family and food, this time of year is the most concentrated Jewish season. I counted 20 festive meals from Rosh Hashanah to Simchat Torah (including the intervening Sabbaths). Twenty!

But why is Sukkot known as the holiday of thanksgiving? It's not our only harvest festival. Passover celebrates the barley harvest, Shavuot marks the grain harvest, and Sukkot rejoices with the fruit and grape harvest. So, although appropriate in our Western context, why did Sukkot become our thanksgiving?

Each major holiday has a triple focus: nature/agriculture, historic/national, and theological/conceptual. Passover, the distinct holiday of national liberation became most closely associated with the theme of redemption. Shavuot celebrates the receiving of the Torah and, therefore, became known as the holiday of revelation. But Sukkot, while celebrating our ancestors' historic wandering in the desert, became the quintessential holiday of the harvest. It's associated with the theme of creation. It's also the one holiday on which we pray for rain and are uniquely commanded to be happy. (Remember those 20 meals!) I can't decide if the source of our happiness, and hence thanksgiving, is the food, or if it's the fact we survive it all.

Surely, the thanksgiving comes from a real sense of thankfulness for life. After completing the cycle of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we should be aware of life's preciousness, precariousness and potential. With all its challenges, life itself is worth some form of humble appreciation. So in that sense, Sukkot is well-timed to coincide with our new consciousness and responsiveness.

While I no longer live by an agricultural pattern, this message of thanksgiving resonates with me. I am thankful for my life, my family and friends, my career and my energy. I am grateful to my tradition and community.

But mostly, I confess, I'm glad it's all over.

We can bring about our own redemption

Dire predictions abound of late: natural disasters such as more monster storms, mutated avian flus to rival the Black Death or the 1918 Spanish flu, and threats of local terror attacks. It's as if our whole civilization has exhaled a universal "Oy gevalt."

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Our recent holiday season began with the solemnity of Rosh Hashanah and ended with the joy of Simchat Torah. Our petitions during that month show that concern with the future and its unpredictability has a long history. We first pray for the restoration of our own, pristine selves. We acknowledge that in the coming year, those who will live or die have their fates sealed. The prayer enumerates all manner of natural and human disasters.

Finally, on Sukkot, we address the millennial longing for a messianic era, praying "Raise up for us the fallen 'sukkah' of David." On Shabbat during Sukkot, the haftorah describes the apocalyptic war of Gog and Magog. We read about the Valley of Dry Bones as a promise of national renewal.

The season is a time of longing for the messianic era of peace.

Among both Jews and Christians, there are those who believe that the end of time is near. Although they are not in agreement about what the end of days means, it's interesting that both camps cite the rise of a renewed Jewish state as being necessary to bring about messianic redemption. Never mind that the Israeli state behaves just like any other humanly constructed national state – with social unrest, government and human corruption and failings, and the overriding shadow of constant warfare – the State of Israel is "the dawn of our redemption."

Some cite natural disasters – earthquakes, fire and flood – as precursors to that time. They see the hand of God in these tragedies. Of course, they ignore the fact that some, like the floods of Katrina, were the result of human neglect and venality. For them, these are warnings from the Almighty that we have strayed from the right path.

Around the time of the destruction of the First Temple, Jews began to perceive the messianic era as one that would entail a national – and human – messiah. Rabbi Akiva was in the mainstream when he declared Bar Kochba to be "the King Messiah," conflating the restoration of an independent Jewish state with a more personal saviour. Certainly the many false messiahs that crowd the Middle Ages, such as Shabtai Zvi, were real human beings that attracted many followers to them with broken promises of redemption and restoration.

But today, what do we mean by our stated longing for the raising up of the fallen kingdom – sukkah – of David? Do we believe that our sins have brought natural catastrophes, or can we acknowledge that they're often made much worse by the work, or neglect, of human hands? Will there be a final war between good and evil to settle the matter?

The early chassidic masters plotted a different course. They saw the everyday acts of devotion, fulfillment of the most humble mitzvot, and kindness to others as the way to bring about the redemption of an imperfect world. Thus they put the onus for bringing that day of universal peace squarely on the shoulders of us – the human race – rather than on the goodwill or wrath meted out by some invisible hand.

So next time we blithely talk about an act of God, let's realize that nature is not God, nor God nature (a dire heresy in monotheistic religions), and that humans are usually the authors of their own worst disasters. Time to dump the gevalt factor and take the messages of personal renewal to heart.

The need to find some outside force to save us from ourselves seems to be bred in our psychic DNA. Somewhere in our earliest beginnings, we began to long for a saving God, as well as fearing a wrathful and destructive one. To explain evil, we invented witches and burned the hapless few who fit our imagined description.

Alas, as Pogo so astutely observed, "We has met the enemy and they is us." We can be the saviours, as well, of our imperfect world and ourselves.

It's up to us to determine when justice will roll down like a mighty river, righteousness like a mighty stream, when peace will fill the earth as the waters fill the sea.

Science vs. religious politics

Our High Holy Days observances concluded last month with the celebration of Simchat Torah, the festival during we complete the reading D'varim, the last book in the Torah, and we turn immediately to read the first verses of Bereshit, the first book of the Torah. In Bereshit, or Genesis, we read the story of creation: "In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth…" This festival is a celebratory time, but it also invites us to reflect on a contemporary, controversial debate.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The year 2005 marks the 80th anniversary of the so-called "Monkey Trial," the now classic case of Tennessee vs. John Scopes. In that American case, Scopes was charged with violating a Tennessee statute prohibiting the teaching of the theory of evolution in the state's schools.

A similar battle is being played out at present in a court in Harrisburg, Pa. Some parents are challenging an October 2004 Dover Area School District resolution compelling teachers to read to their classes a statement in respect of the notion of "intelligent design" before engaging in any instruction concerning evolution.

One of the school-board members recently argued that creationism should prevail in the schools since the United States "was founded on Christianity and our students should be taught as such."

Intelligent design is a re-branding of the notion of creationism and is no more than a pretense for denying evolutionary science.

Intelligent design argues that the world, in its creation and through all of its changes and transformations over the millennia, was preordained and guided by a monotheistic creator and that the developments over time cannot be traced to pure scientific theory. There is no allowance for random changes or the process of natural selection that often occur in nature. In subscribing to the notion that creation was effected solely through an act of a transcendent intelligent agent, intelligent design rejects the knowledge of evolution that we have gleaned from scientific investigation and discovery.

On one hand, it is disturbing that after all these years and after all of the advances of evolutionary science, that we are still engaged in a debate on the merits of evolutionary theory versus creationism. On the other hand, given the modern re-emergence of fundamentalist Christian thinking and its attendant political manifestations in North America, it is not surprising that the issue is again front and centre.

Much has been written in support of both sides of this issue. Readers wishing to engage this debate, particularly with respect to its political fallout, should see the well-documented, academically sound treatise, Creationism's Trojan Horse: The Wedge of Intelligent Design by Barbara Forrest and Paul R. Gross. The authors' main point is the political nature of the controversy – the debate about intelligent design is yet another example of the far-reaching influence of religion in modern politics and policy-making. However, unlike many eastern nations, in the U.S. context, this flies in the face of the constitutional separation of church and state.

The whole modern debate underscores the dominance of faith-based politics in the contemporary landscape of North American – and particularly U.S. – public affairs. The interface of politics and religion continues to influence the making of policy. It is particularly disturbing when faith trumps proven science at the expense of a realistic, scientific understanding of the human condition today.

When arguing the Scopes trial, it is doubtful that lawyers Clarence Darrow and William Jennings Bryan would have imagined that almost a century later the debate over evolution would still attract the prominent attention that it does.

So how then does one explain creation as depicted in Genesis as read at Simchat Torah? Indeed, the Torah is our holy scroll that has been debated and interpreted by Jewish sages throughout our history. Rather than reading it literally, it can be understood in a symbolic sense. In my opinion, Genesis symbolizes the power and majesty of God and is not meant to be a denial of scientific discovery.

Discussions about creationism versus evolution belong in religion classes, not as part of the science curriculum in publicly funded schools. That would bring the advances of science into disrepute and would elevate a particular religious ideology to state-sanctioned teaching. To do so is neither a religious nor a scientific statement. It is simply politics.

The Kirshner File

Yitzhak Rabin changed with the times

Ten years have elapsed since Yigal Amir, a demented 25-year-old Bar-Ilan University law student, shot and killed Israel's prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, the first Sabra to hold that position and the first Israeli leader to be murdered. Amir, an Orthodox Jew who equated territorial compromise with treason, was a fervent opponent of the Oslo peace process that Rabin supported and fostered. "Anyone who gives away part of the Land of Israel must pay in blood," Amir had prophetically declared. As Rabin left a pro-Oslo rally in central Tel Aviv on Nov. 4, 1995, Amir pumped two bullets into his back, shocking and devastating a nation and sending it into mourning.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In the months leading up to his assassination, Israel was polarized by an increasingly rancorous debate on Rabin's policy of making peace with the Palestinians. At anti-Oslo demonstrations, he was likened to a Nazi. The political climate in Israel was raw and volatile. Rabin's embittered widow, Leah, blamed right-wing inciters for his death. In his heartfelt eulogy, Bill Clinton, then president of the United States, described Rabin as "a martyr for peace, but a victim of hate."

The magnitude of Amir's crime, for which he was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1996, was unprecedented. But the extremism that galvanized Amir – a combustible mixture of religious nationalism and messianism – had been brewing since Israel's triumphant victory in the 1967 Six Day War.

In the 1980s, it prompted a band of Jewish zealots to try to murder three Arab mayors in the West Bank and impelled an American Jew, Alan Goodman, to open fire on Muslim worshippers at the Dome of the Rock in eastern Jerusalem. It also drove Baruch Goldstein, a Jewish doctor from Kiryat Arba influenced by Rabbi Meir Kahane's racist ideology, to kill 29 Palestinians at a mosque in Hebron in 1994. Goldstein's rampage was a turning point, ushering in an epoch of Palestinian suicide bombings that wrecked the Oslo process and brought Ariel Sharon to power.

In the numbing aftermath of Rabin's murder, the Knesset passed a resolution that reflected the times. Parliamentarians from all factions, as well as extra-parliamentary movements, promised to "act within the law, display mutual respect, avoid rhetoric of hate and incitement, maintain civilized debate in the Knesset and take action against anyone who threatens democratic governance."

But less than a decade later, as Sharon promoted his plan to withdraw settlers and soldiers from the Gaza Strip and four settlements in the West Bank, the old demons reappeared. Sharon was threatened and Rabin's gravestone on Mt. Herzl was desecrated. Sharon accused extremists of creating a climate conducive to civil war. Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres said, "I fear someone will try to assassinate the prime minister."

Thankfully, no assassination plots were uncovered. But in two separate incidents, a disaffected soldier with Kahanist views murdered four Israeli Arabs, while a settler from the West Bank killed a number of Palestinians. Both resorted to violence in a misguided bid to torpedo Israel's looming withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank. If nothing else, these murders illustrated an unpalatable reality of Israeli society: There are hotheads out there who would not hesitate to kill to make a political point.

Yitzhak Rabin

In cutting down Rabin, Amir eliminated not only a major adversary, but probably altered the course of history. From almost the moment Oslo was officially ushered in with the Declaration of Principles on Sept. 13, 1993, in Washington, D.C., Palestinian terrorists launched a campaign to undermine it by killing as many Israelis as possible. The attacks certainly disheartened Rabin, but he was determined to push forward and not allow extremists to set the agenda.

What is certain is that the reign of terrorism catapulted Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud challenger and Oslo opponent, to the prime ministership in the 1996 general election. By a razor-thin margin, he defeated Peres, Rabin's successor, in an election that was Peres' to lose. With some caveats, Netanyahu pledged to carry out Israel's Oslo commitments. But Netanyahu, unlike Rabin, had a deeply ingrained suspicion of the land-for-peace formula, and he did much to sour Oslo's atmosphere.

Rabin, a cautious pragmatist, may have harboured doubts about Oslo and the sincerity of his partner, Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority. But he stayed on course, being convinced that the alternative – no negotiations with the Palestinians – would have been far worse. As he put it in his memoirs: "There is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that the risks of peace are preferable by far to the grim certainties that await every nation in war." Rabin penned these lines in the late 1970s, long before Oslo dawned, but it is fair to say that this philosophy basically coloured his approach to the Palestinians.

Rabin – Israel's chief of staff from 1965 to 1968 and its ambassador to the United States from 1968 to 1973 – succeeded Golda Meir in his first turn as prime minister from 1974 to 1977. Coming from the hawkish wing of the Labor party, he opposed negotiations with the PLO, and was once quoted as saying that Israel and the PLO could meet only on the battlefield. In 1976, he authorized the legendary Entebbe raid to free Israeli hostages hijacked by Palestinian terrorists. A supporter of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, he believed that the Palestinians should be satisfied with statehood in Jordan rather than in the West Bank and Gaza. Later, when he was defence minister in a national unity government, he ordered soldiers to "break the bones" of Arab protesters in the first Palestinian uprising, which broke out in 1987.

Rabin's views, however, were not carved in stone. He was capable of responding to fresh circumstances. After the 1991 Gulf War, during which Israel was hit by 39 Iraqi Scud missiles, he modified his outlook. He was now convinced that Israel had to settle the festering Palestinian issue so that more attention could be paid to the threat from Iraq and Iran – which were trying to acquire nuclear arms – and Islamic fundamentalism, which saw no room for a Jewish state in the Middle East.

In 1992, his government repealed a law that prohibited contact between Israeli citizens and the PLO. This cleared the way for Israel's secret talks with the PLO leadership in Norway. In the aftermath of the 1991 Madrid peace conference, Israel opened negotiations with Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza. But when Rabin realized that they were beholden to the PLO, and could not lift a finger without Arafat's approval, he concluded that Israel had no alternative but to deal with the PLO.

But even as the subsequent Declaration of Principles was signed, Rabin could hardly bring himself to shake Arafat's hand. His body language was indicative of his ambivalence toward Arafat. Nonetheless, Rabin eventually formed a working relationship with him.

Rabin hewed to the belief that the territory Israel had captured in the Six Day War could be traded to advance its strategic interests. As he wrote in 1979, "We must view the territories... as bargaining chips for negotiations with our neighbours for the attainment of peace or for the advancement of political objectives aimed at amelioration of the Arab-Israeli conflict. That is what I thought then in 1967, and what I think today."

Rabin wanted to give up Gaza and relinquish heavily populated areas of the West Bank. In his final speech to the Knesset in October 1995, he spoke of retaining only settlement blocs near the old Green Line. He did not speak of full-fledged Palestinian statehood, but of "a Palestinian entity that is less than a state." Had he lived longer, he would have doubtless recognized the need for unfettered Palestinian statehood.

Rabin also demonstrated flexibility on other fronts. When he became prime minister for the second time in 1992, he said, "We will not leave the Golan Heights, not even in exchange for a peace treaty." At most, he would consider "cosmetic changes" on the Golan. But in August 1993, he authorized the U.S. secretary of state, Warren Christopher, to inform Hafez Assad, then Syria's president, that Israel would hypothetically consider a pullback to the June 4, 1967 lines. Rabin linked the depth of an Israeli withdrawal to the degree to which Syria would be willing to normalize relations with Israel. Since Syria's counter-offer fell short of Rabin's expectations, Rabin's hypothetical proposal died.

Rabin, however, capped his career with a peace treaty with Jordan. He and King Hussein signed it on Oct. 26, 1994, in a festive ceremony in the Negev. Although the treaty was buffeted by the second intifadah – and is still opposed by many Jordanians – it stands as one of Rabin's singular achievements.

Rabin was a realist, a hard-headed and clear-eyed soldier/statesman who recognized that conciliation, if not outright peace, with the Arabs is not an impossible dream.

This is his legacy, and for that he will be remembered by Israelis and Arabs alike.

United Way seeks to ease new immigrant hardships

By RANDI DRUZIN
UJA Federation

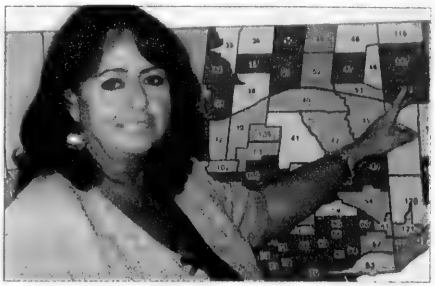
This week Jewish Toronto focuses on the close connection between the United Way and our Jewish community. In this special report, we examine the concerns of United Way president Frances Lankin about trends taking place in the GTA and the ways in which Jewish community agencies - many of which are beneficiaries of UJA Federation - benefit from United Way's assistance.

The person who leads one of Toronto's most venerable charities is concerned about the way in which new immigrants are integrating into Toronto society and the resulting social problems.

Frances Lankin, president and chief executive officer of the United Way of Greater Toronto, says Jewish immigrants settled near each other when they came to Toronto in great numbers in the first half of the last century. Their close proximity facilitated the establishment of social agencies to help them adapt to their new home, and it fostered a sense of belonging.

But the same isn't true, she says, for many of Toronto's immigrants today.

Due in part to the lack of affordable housing in the inner city, immigrants from various ethnic groups are scattered throughout Toronto's suburbs. Indeed, a United Way report released last year not only pinpointed a poverty increase in Toronto's city core between 1981 and 2001, but also the movement of many high-poverty neighbourhoods from the inner city to inner suburbs such as North York and Scarborough. As a result, many new immigrants haven't established the social infrastructure needed to ease their transition into Canadian society, and they feel isolated. Compounding the problem, these newcomers are suffering financial hardship.



United Way president and CEO Frances Lankin identifies neighbourhoods in the inner suburbs of Toronto where there is a shortage of service and support for poor families and youth.

"People in high-poverty neighbourhoods struggle to find affordable housing and well-paying jobs, and they're under economic stress," notes Lankin. "The situation is like a huge red flag waving. Toronto is regarded as a city of tolerance and social cohesion, but it's not that way at all," she says.

Improve newcomers' living conditions, Lankin believes, and there will be fewer violent gun outbursts. She believes the recent wave of gun violence, about which she is alarmed, can be attributed in part to a lack of services that engage neighbourhood residents and support their families, particularly when it comes to new Canadians.

Lankin's organization has been taking steps to improve the lives of newcomers by initiating research and bringing people together.

The United Way of Greater Toronto has teamed up with the City of Toronto to form the Strong Neighbourhoods Task Force, a coalition consisting of 22 leaders from the government, community, labour and corporate sectors.

Acting as a catalyst for social change is a relatively new sphere of activity for United Way, which has made its name by raising and distributing funds to social and health service agencies since it was established in 1956.

More organizations, and more Canadians, need to take an interest in the economic and social challenges that face newcomers, she says.

"We want to create awareness of the problem. We need to take collective responsibility," she says. "When you have people not enjoying a decent quality of life, that poses a challenge to social cohesion and, ultimately, it leads to the decline of community relations. That's not the kind of society I would like to live in."

Clients of Jewish agencies depend on United Way

Half a century of support for the Jewish community

Toronto's Jewish community has changed in the last 50 years and the United Way of Greater Toronto has, too. But one thing has remained constant: the exemplary relationship between the United Way and its member Jewish agencies – a relationship that has been ongoing since 1956, the United Way's first year of operation.

Four years ago when Frances Lankin became president and chief executive officer, she met executives from 160 member agencies, including those based in the Jewish community.

"I was absolutely taken with the philanthropic tradition in the Jewish community," Lankin says. "Jewish agencies serve not only their own people but also the broader community."

The United Way gave nearly $3.5 million to Jewish agencies in 2005. The bulk of the money ($1.67 million) went to Jewish Family and Child Service, but eight other Jewish agencies also receive funds.

Among them is the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living – a UJA Federation partner agency – receiving close to $160,000 this year for services to assist Russian immigrants and other seniors at the Centre which offers, among its many services, recreation, educational and fitness courses.

"We couldn't provide this scope of services without financial assistance," says executive director Esta Wall. "The funding is critical."

In 2005, the United Way provided over $111,000 to the Centre, which serves the cultural, educational, social and recreational needs of those in downtown Toronto. That sum included a grant of $10,000 to support a pilot program for abused women and their children.

Two-thirds of United Way money goes toward funding general membership, for those who have financial difficulty affording membership fees. The remaining third of the money helps to fund programs for children and seniors.

Farther north, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre – also a UJA Federation partner agency - is a beneficiary of United Way as well.

Sherry Kulman, the executive director, says the Centre received approximately $450,000 from the charity in 2005, a large percentage of which subsidized the Centre's health, fitness and camp programs. "The money allows us to offer these programs to individuals who couldn't afford them otherwise," says Kulman. "The United Way is a terrific organization. It's well-run and well-managed," she adds.

Laurie Harrison, the vice president of finance and human resources at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care couldn't agree more about the United Way's importance. Baycrest received $300,000 from United Way this year, and used the money to support the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Community Centre, which is a multilingual community centre for seniors; the Community Day Centre for Seniors and the Seniors Counselling and Referral program.

"United Way funding really does make a difference, primarily in supporting community programs," she says.

Several other agencies feel the same way including JVS Toronto, which offers assessment, counseling and placement support services to people of all ages seeking new careers and new employment opportunities.

The agency received close to $500,000 from United Way this year, a portion of which it used to cover operational costs. United Way funding enables the agency to provide a sliding fee for services, says Kim Coulter, vice president of operations and special services. "Our goal is to not turn people away," she says. "So, United Way funding is like heaven."

Clients of the Bernard Betel Centre participate in an evening of music and dance.

"This kind of support is vitally important to the Jewish community," says Ted Sokolsky, president and chief executive officer of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "The United Way is a dynamic and progressive organization, and a real role model in helping to build communities." Lankin is quick to point out that the relationship between the United Way and the Jewish community is mutually beneficial. She counts several members of the Jewish community among her advisors and mentors. "And let's not forget," she adds, "many of the United Way's volunteers and donors are Jewish."

United Way's Beneficiaries

The United Way contributes approximately $3.25 million annually to the following Jewish agencies in Toronto:

- Bathurst Jewish Community Centre
- Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care
- Bernard Betel Centre
- Circle of Care
- Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS)
- JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services)Toronto
- JVS Toronto
- Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre
- Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa

Schwartz & Reisman donate $12 Million

New Jewish Centre coming to York Region

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

Gerald Schwartz, chairman and CEO of Onex Corporation, and his wife Heather Reisman, president and CEO of Indigo, have signed a contract to donate $12 million for a new Jewish Centre in the city of Vaughan. The Schwartz/Reisman Centre will adorn the 50 acre Lebovic Jewish Community Campus at the corner of Bathurst and Weldrick. It's part of UJA Federation's $250 million Tomorrow Campaign to build three Jewish community campuses in the Greater Toronto Area.

Both Schwartz and Reisman stressed the extent to which the new centre will serve all area residents, not just Jewish community members. "This centre will be used by millions of people over the years and only some will be from the Jewish community," said Schwartz.

"The Schwartz/Reisman Centre on the breathtaking Lebovic Campus will be dedicated to building a burgeoning city," added David Engel, chair of UJA Federation's Board of Directors. "Committed to excellence and the best of Jewish values, the centre will be a modern, thriving hub of cultural, educational, recreational, athletic and communal activity that will offer its users a lifelong learning experience."

UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky called the Schwartz/Reisman gift signing "an historic occasion" and "the launch of a brand new chapter in the history of Toronto and the Jewish community."

The Schwartz/Reisman Centre, to include world-standard social, athletic, recreational, cultural and life-long learning facilities, will serve York Region's quickly growing Jewish population of 60,000 and all residents of York Region.

The Lebovic Campus, in addition to the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, will feature schools, social service agencies, parks, and other open spaces. The world-renowned Canadian architectural firm of Petroff Partners has designed the campus for which construction will begin in November.

The Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum, is the largest, not-for-profit Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history.

Toronto mayor David Miller praised the Tomorrow Campaign for its vision. "It's all about building a city for everyone," he said.

UJA Federation campaign reaches $37 million

Funding for the poor, young people and Eilat-Eilot is underway

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

As UJA Federation's Campaign 2006 surges forward with $37 million in donations to date, the campaign's three strategic commitments are being put into practice. Campaign 2006 is committed to assisting the Jewish poor and vulnerable, rebuilding Israeli lives after five years of terror, and connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life.

Noar, which means youth in Hebrew, is an initiative of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), which helps to provide those crucial Jewish links. Noar is meant to enhance informal Jewish education, which includes youth groups, camping, March of the Living and Israel experience programs. For many young people these activities represent their only interaction with Jewish life and Noar is working hard to improve the quality and substance of these activities. The more vibrant and genuine the experiences, the greater the chance that young people will form a long, lasting relationship with the Jewish community, notes Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's senior vice president for Jewish Education and Identity.

Noar, an initiative of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, is working to connect Jewish youth to Jewish life.

"Noar is a critically important to the scope of the BJE's commitment to Jewish education in Toronto," Epstein said. "The informal sphere opens up new portals to Jewish identity for young people who have no connection in any way to Jewish life."

UJA Federation donors are also helping low income Jewish families in Toronto who are struggling to equip themselves with the urgent necessities of life. The Family Necessities Program, with a $40,000 grant from UJA Federation, assists Jewish Family & Child Service clients with the purchase of beds, cribs, childcare items, or medications not covered by government plans. It's one of many initiatives, including supplementary income support, provided by UJA Federation for our community's most vulnerable.

"Having a decent bed to sleep on is a matter of health as well as a matter of personal dignity." said Eric Kirsh, supervisor of Financial Assistance and Rehabilitation at JF&CS. "The Family Necessities Program makes it possible for us to purchase new beds for entire families. Without this help, they would be sleeping on the floor."

In Israel, UJA Federation's participation in the Partnership 2000 project, is beginning to introduce a high skilled population to the southern Eilat-Eilot region, Toronto's partnership community. It's a critical need for the area because the population is overwhelmingly comprised of low skilled tourism industry workers. In order to make the city of Eilat a centre for higher education, UJA Federation will contribute $800,000 toward that objective over the next three years, an amount that will be matched by private Israeli foundations. The plan hopes to attract academics, students and related industry to the area. Through a scholarship program with Ben Gurion University's satellite campus in Eilat, UJA Federation hopes to entice students from around the country to study in Eilat, as well as making it easier for those in Eilat to afford a higher education.

"Eilat/Eilot is made up primarily of low wage unskilled workers, mostly in the hotel and tourism industry. These scholarships will allow them and their families an equal opportunity to be higher educated for better jobs with a more fulfilling life," said Brian Schachter, co-chair, with Morley Brown, of UJA Federation's partnership with Eilat/Eilot.

Holocaust Education Week focuses on the positive

By ROCHELLE KAHN

Honey Carr and Joan Shapero, the chairs of Holocaust Education Week (HEW), which runs until November 9, are enthused about the inspiring focus of this year's diverse and compelling programs. "Especially in today's world," Shapero explained, "we need to deliver the messages of goodness, building awareness of those moments when ordinary people stood up against extraordinary circumstances."

Carr agrees with the need to highlight the hopeful stories that came out of the horror and evil. "We need to dwell on the positive; we can't always feel we're the victims," she explained. "There were good people doing good things during the Holocaust. When asked why they did, they answered 'why not?'"

When HEW opened its 25th year on October 27 at Temple Sinai, Emmy-award winning filmmaker Pierre Sauvage addressed that topic. It was Sauvage's 400 neighbours in the tiny French farming village of Le Chambon during the early 1940's, who risked their own lives to save 5,000 Jews.

For Sauvage, who spoke about his acclaimed 1989 film, Weapons of the Spirit: Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, A Conspiracy of Goodness, the challenge is clear. "It's as important to face good as it is to face evil," he said, "but we tend to be afraid to. Measuring ourselves against Hitler is easy; it's much harder to measure ourselves against goodness."

Two nights later, the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto continued the theme of "the kindness of strangers" with an event that explored why members of a German family endangered their own lives to protect total strangers. This fascinating program united two remarkable women – Sister Renate Seebass, daughter of the rescuing family and Professor Mona Sue Weissmark, daughter of one of the men saved. Together, they told their personal story about the power of human compassion.

"It's still difficult but, using the world today as a backdrop, these stories remind us that there are people who find being a bystander the hardest of all," said Lorraine Sandler, chair of the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

Holocaust Education Week concludes on November 9 at 7:30 p.m. with We Remember and Honour - a Kristallnacht commemoration event taking place at Adath Israel Congregation (37 Southbourne Ave.)

Israeli army unit helps out around the world

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Picture an Egyptian general following the orders of an Israeli army commander.

Sound strange?

This unprecedented event occurred a year ago, as members of Israel's national search and rescue unit worked in tandem with their Egyptian counterparts after a terror attack at the Taba Hilton in the Sinai.

"It was like a dream [having] Egyptian soldiers working with Israeli soldiers, one next to the other," says Col. (Res) Gidon Bar-On, the unit's commander.

"It symbolizes what the unit [represents]: peace, communication and helping each other."

Bar-On gave a talk recently at Toronto's First Narayever Congregation about dramatic life-saving missions carried out by the unit in such places as Turkey, Armenia and Kenya.

He also showed two short films that showed rescuers digging, crawling and hammering away at piles of debris in search of disaster survivors.

In one clip, a rescuer pulled a nine-year-old Turkish girl named Shiran Franco out from under heaps of rubble, where she was trapped for four days following an earthquake in 1999.

Those moments make every minute of the harrowing operations worth it, says Bar-On, a contractor by trade.

"When you are saving other people's lives, it's like giving birth," he says.

"This is what motivates us."

Today, it has about 200 members, all army reservists.

As part of the selection process, aspiring rescuers must complete strict training exercises, including timed missions in which they search for puppets buried inside demolished structures.

On the job, they use an array of tools and high-tech devices – including cranes, large drills and telescopes connected to closed circuit televisions – to look and listen for survivors.

Bar-On says membership is generally restricted to people in their 30s and 40s.

"We don't take younger soldiers, because the things you see are terrible," he says.

Though scenes witnessed by the officers can be daunting, they work through any social or emotional issues internally as a unit.

"When we end operations, we stay put for 24 hours, go to the base and in small groups of four or five people, we sit together and talk about what we're feeling," he explains.

After they leave a disaster zone, unit members are forbidden to keep in contact with people they have saved.

"After we save someone, we will go to the person and speak to them, but we don't want to keep a connection," Bar-On says.

"The relationship between the rescuer and the rescued is very bad if it continues, because you have [dependence]."

Unlike most, if not all, other Israeli army units, the search-and-rescuers don't operate in secrecy. Rather, they share their training techniques with whoever is interested in learning.

"Concerning saving lives, there are no secrets," Bar-On says. "We share this with all countries."

To that end, the unit participates in workshops across the globe and has published a book about "revolutionary" procedures for both administering disaster medicine and treating injured people trapped under debris.

But not all countries are interested in the unit's expertise.

Pakistan rejected its services when they were offered recently after a devastating earthquake killed tens of thousands in the Muslim country.

Iran and Sri Lanka have also rejected the unit's presence on the ground after experiencing natural disasters.

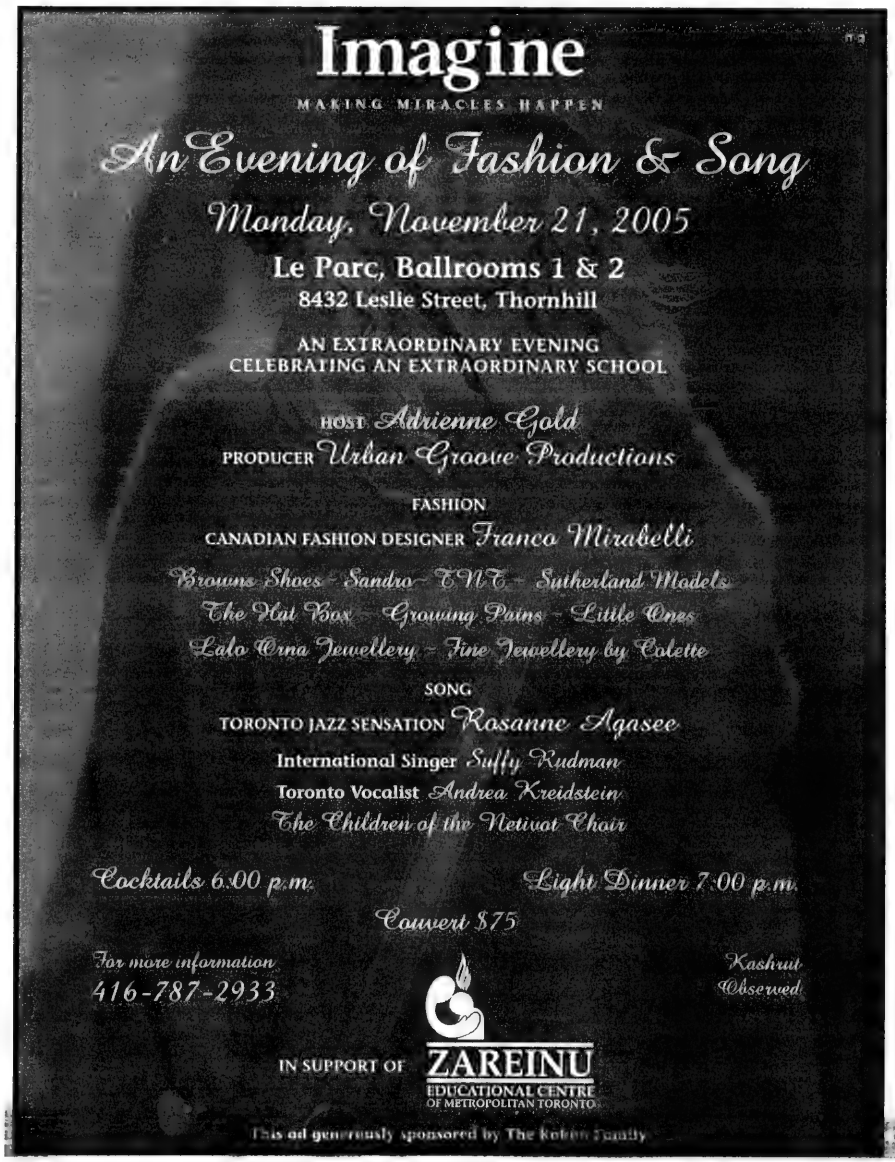
So be it, says Bar-On.

"We are not ashamed to wear Israeli uniforms –we are proud to do that," he says.

"And we wouldn't go without our uniforms."



Nostra Aetate conference

The 40th anniversary of the landmark document that dramatically changed Jewish-Catholic relations will be commemorated at a conference and a gala dinner next week at the University of Toronto.

The daylong event, titled "Nostra Aetate – Our World," is being sponsored by the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, the Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto and U of T's St. Michael's College, Regis College and St. Augustine's Seminary. It will be held Nov. 10.

Nostra Aetate, Latin for "in our time," was adopted by the Second Vatican Council on Oct. 28, 1965, and revolutionized the Catholic Church's approach to Jews and Judaism after nearly 2,000 years of persecution by repudiating the charge that Jews killed Jesus, as well as by ending the church's interest in converting Jews and reaffirming the eternal covenant between God and the Jewish people.

Among those expected to participate in the conference and attend the dinner are Rabbi Riccardo Di Segni, the chief rabbi of Rome; Prof. David Novak of U of T; and Cardinal Edward Cassidy of Australia.

The dinner will be held at the Montecassino Hotel in North York, with a reception starting at 5:30. Kosher meals are available on request.

The importance of a name

By LISA NEWMAN GREENSPAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

"A good name" was what my late father always stressed he was leaving my brother and me, in his next breath quoting Isaiah on the values he lived by: "do justice, love mercy, walk humbly before God." Our Samuel name was once well known in Latvia's northwestern province, Kourland. My great-grandfather Samuel Samuel (yes, that really was his name!) prospered there as a merchant and entrepreneur, and with his wife, conceived 24 children, a full 12 of whom lived to adulthood.

Our forebears had lived in Kourland since at least 1750; before that, probably in Hamburg, and before that, perhaps in Spain or Portugal. In the 18th and 19th centuries, many male Samuel children were born, carrying the family name forward. I thought of the importance of names as my children, cousins and I attended a ceremony last year in Liepaja (formerly Libau), Latvia.

Through punctilious research and awesome determination, retired U.S. chemistry professor Edward Anders ensured the creation of a Holocaust memorial in Liepaja that would preserve the names of Libau's approximately 7,000 Jewish victims, names not recorded anywhere else. So few Latvian Jews survived the Holocaust that it was not possible to even piece together a Yizkor (remembrance) book.

The Liepaja Holocaust memorial is elegant in its simplicity, reminiscent of the Washington D.C. Vietnam War memorial. Set off at the entrance to the still-used Jewish cemetery in Liepaja, it is a simple metal structure with a series of glass panes behind which are visible long lists of names, stark and moving. Among the names of victims we found my great-aunt and uncle, as well as other more distant family members.

All 100 of us attending the ceremony were attached somehow to Libau, though very few had ever lived there and many, including my family and I, had never visited eastern Europe before. We came from Finland, Australia, France, Sweden, Israel, the United States and Canada, as well as from Liepaja's present-day Jewish community, and we ranged in age from four months to over 80 years.

Even those who had never before visited Liepaja shared a handed-down family memory of a prosperous, cultured, orderly, prewar town whose fortuitous geography made for ideal trading and shipping conditions. I remember my father's especially warm tone when talking of his Libau boyhood, his warm memories of the sea's comforting whisper and his lifelong fondness for fish, especially herring – a taste both my brother and I inherited.

Other reminiscences I have heard and read treat Libau as a beloved, lost mother/lover, longed for in her absence. Here we all were, generations later, bearing and being borne along by the memories of that long-ago, pleasant and peaceful community.

The Soviet occupiers made cosmopolitan Libau with its strategic location into a closed, high-security naval base. Today Liepaja's shabby, dilapidated buildings house people traumatized by successive Russian and German invasions. Passersby hurried on without answering my innocent request for directions – "I am Canadian, therefore surely accepted by all." My only similar experience was in the 1980s when travelling alone in the Republic of China, another closed society just beginning to open itself to foreigners.

We saw the damage done to the once-proud town by decades of occupation, war and trauma: ornately decorated buildings are sooty and need restoration; the central rose garden, the Rosenplatz, waits to be tended; electric trolley trams, the pride of the city in 1890, now look old and shabby. The fabled white sandy beach is open to the public again since the Soviet navy's 1994 departure, but in early June, it was too chilly for bathing.

Today, 398 people in Liepaje identify themselves as Jews, ranging in age from one to 83, but it is widely known that other Jews who live there prefer not to acknowledge their identity. Most of the families are from Russia, not originally from Liepaja.

An exception is one of the Liepaja Jewish community leaders, Ilana Ivanovna, a translator whose parents survived by hiding in a bakery cellar in town for almost two years, while almost all other Jews were exterminated. A baker, a Righteous Gentile, built a shelter in the basement where the ovens provided heat, and food was smuggled in from the bakery.

Sadly, however, among the Latvians were many enthusiastic Nazi supporters, and the rate of destruction of Latvian Jews during the Nazi period was so high (98 per cent) that the community was virtually exterminated.

Anders, the author of the Libau Holocaust memorial project, was one of very very few survivors. Yet, only 60 years later, Jewish holidays are celebrated once again in the Liepaja Jewish community: the Lubavich rabbi travels regularly from Riga to Liepaja to lead a Passover seder, light Chanukah candles, etc., and Hebrew is once again being taught to Jewish children there.

Many know Libau as the port through which émigrant Jews streamed out of Europe for America and other lands; so many passed through here that the town build a large transit centre to house them. From the late 1600s, Libau and Kourland had had stable Jewish populations; on the eve of World War I, Jews in Kourland numbered about 68,000, a good number of those in the town of Libau itself.

Libau's warm water port, heated by the Gulf Stream, and its proximity to both Germany and Russia, made it a centre of trade and commerce: goods such as timber from Russia passed through the port in great quantity. Samuel Samuel owned variously a flour mill, a textile manufacture, a distribution agency for furs and military outfitting, and a brick factory.

Most of our Samuel family left Libau well before World War II. Their lives were turned upside down by World War I, as well as by the following revolutionary turbulence. Our Samuel name is not being carried on in Libau today. But the tall black granite monument erected in 1910 that marks the grave of Samuel Samuel with German and Hebrew inscriptions is in excellent condition. Very moved to see it, we took photographs, said the traditional prayers and left stones on the graves to mark our visit. In the same wrought-iron-fenced compound with the graves of Samuel Samuel and his wife Therese Sebba Samuel is another, much more modest stone, so weathered that the name is illegible. Was one of their 12 children buried beside them? I will write the record keepers and try to find out.

Names. Samuel Samuel's trademark for his company was "Phoenix." His reasons for choosing this symbol are lost to us his descendants, but it does seem apt for a people who, despite great odds, persist in surviving and in honouring our ancestors' names.

Lisa Newman Greenspan (born Samuel) lives in Toronto.

An investigation into bar/bat mitzvahs

Thirteen and a Day: The Bar and Bat Mitzvah Across America*, by Mark Oppenheimer; Farrar, Straus and Giroux.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Have you heard about rite 13? It is an innovative ritual in some Protestant churches, modelled on the bar mitzvah. In 2003, a minister in North Carolina told the New York Times, "We realized there were no established rites of passage for adolescents in our church and our culture. We thought we wanted to do something similar for our kids."

Twelve hundred churches now make use of an elaborate curriculum, which includes suggestions for rite 13. In certain suburbs, non-Jewish families throw parties for their 13-year-olds, lest they feel left out.

The modern bat mitzvah, involving the 12- or 13-year-old daughter, originated in 1922, when Mordecai Kaplan, founder of the liberal Reconstructionist movement, led a ceremony for his daughter, Judith, at his synagogue in New York City.

The Torah makes no mention of bar mitzvah, nor does the Talmud, although 13 is first mentioned as an age of maturity in Pirkei Avot, the third century mishnahic tractate of ethical precepts.

Some time in the Middle Ages, 13 and a day became the age of Jewish majority: before then a boy was forbidden to lay tfillin or be counted in a minyan, but at 13 he was obligated to do so. Scholars conclude that in medieval times the bar mitzvah seems "to have been a relatively isolated practice."

"Bar mitzvahs might have become extinct in America, but for the influx after World War II of thousands of Orthodox Jewish European refugees and the growth, at the same time, of the Conservative movement, founded as a middle path between Reform and Orthodoxy and committed to the bar mitzvah. In Reform Judaism, the bar mitzvah made a comeback in the late 1960s and 1970s, when young Jews and their rabbis, influenced by the ethnic pride movements, the counterculture and the resurgence of Zionism after the Six Day War, began to emphasize the study of Hebrew."

Mark Oppenheimer, an American Jewish journalist, spent two years investigating the growing popularity of bar/bat mitzvahs. "I travelled around the county trying every Saturday to find a bar or bat mitzvah to crash. Sometimes I invited myself ahead of time, but just as often I showed up and hoped people would talk to me afterward."

His findings include information gleaned from bar and bat mitzvah candidates, parents, guests, DJs, Torah coaches, rabbis, cantors and also from several adults who have chosen to prepare for their own belated ceremonies. The range of preparation, execution and experiences reflects a variety of denominations (from guitar-strumming Jewish Renewal to the haredi), geography, budget, community, individual spirituality and learning styles, and parental expectations.

In what became a spiritual journey, he witnessed ceremonies in cities large and small, including a chassidic event in Anchorage, Ala., where the boy presented his speech in Yiddish in a snowed-in hotel.

In Toronto, Oppenheimer was turned off by an entrepreneur who started an online b'nai mitzvah gift registry to save children from duplicate presents. "I asked him how he had come up with the idea. 'My daughter got three menorahs, two lava lamps and an Eskimo sculpture,' he said. 'She loved the Tiffany bracelet she got. So my wife saw the need for a gift registry and here we are.'" But a year after that interview the business failed.

Despite well-publicized excesses that sometimes accompany the celebration, this book demonstrates that the observance is largely positive, a coming-of-age experience that leads not only to a growth in self-confidence, but also to a measure of Jewish learning and proud identity.

The Jewish way with words, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

My father never lived to see his dream come true of an all-Yiddish-speaking Canada. – David Steinberg [http://tinyurl.com/8o9ea]

At least Steinberg gave us David – and many other Jewish parents gave us sons and daughters who have been able to help us crack a smile or make a serious point with only a handful of well-chosen words. Today, more Jewish sayings to ponder, amuse and share. (Bookmark these sites for next time you're called on to deliver a speech and are looking for just the right line to start.)

"If I forget thee O Jerusalem…" – Psalms 137:5. Jews have always striven for the right words to describe Jerusalem. Not surprisingly, there are many pages devoted to those sayings. Here are two of the best:

• One with Talmudic quotes: "Ten measures of beauty descended to the world, nine were taken by Jerusalem." – Kiddushin 49b [http://jerusalemlife.com/jlmag/jlquotes.htm]

• And the other page has contemporary quotes about the city such as this one: "Through a historical catastrophe – the destruction of Jerusalem by the emperor of Rome – I was born in one of the cities in the Diaspora. But I always deemed myself a child of Jerusalem, one who is in reality a native of Jerusalem." – S.Y. Agnon, upon receiving the Nobel Prize for literature in 1966 [http://tinyurl.com/cylbk]

You don't have to be a Nobel Prize winner to have a way with words. Some of the juiciest Jewish sayings are anonymous, in Yiddish, and just a tad nasty:

• Ale tsores vos ikh hob oyf mayn hartsn, zoln oysgeyn tsu zayn kop. (All problems I have in my heart, should go to his head.)

• Khasene hobn zol er mit di malekh hamoves tokhter. (He should marry the daughter of the Angel of Death.)

• A kleyn kind zol nokh im heysn. (A young child should be named after him.) Ouch! [http://tinyurl.com/9syed]

Of course, Jews don't have a monopoly on wit or provocative statements. I particularly like the sites that feature quotes about Jews by non-Jews. Here is one: "I will insist the Hebrews have [contributed] more to civilize men than any other nation… They are the most glorious nation that ever inhabited this Earth. The Romans and their empire were but a bubble in comparison to the Jews." – John Adams, second president of the United States. [http://tinyurl.com/97647]

You'll also find on this page the justly famous 1899 quote from Mark Twain that concludes, "All things are mortal but the Jew; all other forces pass, but he remains. What is the secret of his immortality?" The quote is too long to reproduce here but if you're not familiar with it, do yourself a favour and look it up.

Not all non-Jews have had such a high opinion of the Jews as Messrs. Adams and Twain. You'll find some of those quotes reflected on the page, too.

Now that you have all this wisdom at your fingertips, what can you do with it beyond quote them to your friends? The Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life has put together an interesting lesson plan that brings quotes into the classroom. In their case, they have focused on Judaism and the treatment of animals. Students are taught quotes such as, "A righteous person has regard for the life of his animals" from Proverbs 12:10, and are then asked to create their own "Talmudic" commentaries. Teachers can easily adapt this lesson plan to teach other Jewish themes – free will, holiness, kindness, humour and adversity – by substituting the quotes found at the sites mentioned in this column. [http://tinyurl.com/7kdnv]

I started the column with Steinberg's Canadian dream. Let's conclude with a quote with a view of Jewish life south of the border: "The time is at hand when the wearing of a prayer shawl and skullcap will not bar a man from the White House, unless, of course, the man is Jewish." – Jules Farber [http://tinyurl.com/9htmk]

Witness on the Middle East, which brings together Catholics and Protestants and is based in New Jersey.

"It's not only about divestment," she told The CJN. "It's about hearts and minds and opportunities for propaganda. We're especially concerned about Sabeel."

Placing the issue in historical context, Lautt said Arabs rejected the two-state solution for which Sabeel calls in 1948, 1956, 1967, 1973 and finally in 2000, when Yasser Arafat walked away from the Camp David talks and launched the second intifadah.

Ateek has called the creation of Israel "a grievous injustice," Lautt told reporters, and has repeatedly pointed to the Jewish state as the sole cause of the conflict while failing to hold the Palestinian leadership accountable for its history of violence and its role in fomenting conflict.

Referring to Israel as "a Christ-killer is not the language of someone seeking peace and justice," said Lautt. "After the Holocaust, we all know where that road leads."

Divestment "encourages churches to blame Israel and ignore the Palestinians," remarked Dexter Van Zile, Christian outreach director for the David Project Center for Jewish Leadership in Boston.

Sabeel "encourages anti-Jewish hostility," he said. Referring to the organization's repeated attacks against Israel's security barrier, Van Zile said Sabeel "has nothing to say about the barrier between India and Pakistan, on disputed territory."

Van Zile's own church, the United Church of Christ, voted to examine divestment soon after last year's decision by the Presbyterian Church.

Rev. Bruce Chilton, an Episcopal (Anglican) priest, said his New York diocese has endorsed investment in both Israel and the Palestinian territories.

"The children of Abraham need one another in order to grow into Abraham's inheritance," he said.

Rev. William Harter, a Presbyterian minister and activist in a number of groups designed to foster Christian-Jewish dialogue, warned that continued divestment campaigns pose "serious risks" and are "unworkable" because they "will hurt Palestinians as much as Israelis, if not more, since the two economies, if they were to be successful, would need to be so closely intertwined."

They also send a symbolic message: "Israel has not done what we insisted and therefore we're going to take punitive action."

And he slammed his own church, saying the passage of last year's measure on divestment "has sown very deep divisions. There is increasing disaffection across the United States in Presbyterian churches small and large as people gradually become aware of the implications of this for the survival of the Jewish state."

The resolution, which also described Israel as the main impediment to peace without mentioning Palestinian violence, has resulted in "disaffection and decline in support" for the national Presbyterian Church.

The measure has also "minimized if not completely eliminated" the possibility of the Presbyterian Church USA's role as peacemakers in the conflict.

Divestment "raises memories of boycotts and is designed to undermine the survival and flourishing of the Jewish state. It has to do with survival…not only for the State of Israel but Jews all over the world.

"I alert the Canadian churches to this reality."

Canadian churches have not arrived at policies of divestment. Last year, the Anglican Church of Canada said it had no plans to explore divestment "at this time."

But Jewish communal officials have said they are disturbed at the support of the Sabeel conference by the United Church of Canada.

In 2003, the church approved a landmark document – now policy – calling for improved relations with Jews and stating that anti-Semitism and anti-Judaism are "affronts to the gospel of Jesus Christ."

Also in 2003, the United Church signed a sweeping statement against anti-Semitism that was sponsored by major Christian denominations.

Ruth Klein of B'nai Brith blasted the Sabeel conference as "blatant propaganda" and a blow to Christian-Jewish relations. "It's a throwback to a time when anti-Semitism was the core ideology of Christianity," she said.

A handout to reporters quoted Ateek as describing the Israeli government as "modern-day Herods," and as "a crucifixion system" that is "operating daily."

What Makes A Great School Great?

Cantor Weinberg celebrates 18 years with Pride

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Pride of Israel Synagogue is holding a special celebration to honour Cantor Charles Weinberg's 18th year with the synagogue.

The Nov. 13 event – titled the "18th Chai Anniversary Gala," an appropriate name since Weinberg is also the owner of Chai Kosher Poultry – will give the 750-family congregation an opportunity to honour a man who board chair Sherryl Haberman says has been an inspiration to the community through his words and actions.

Cantor Charles Weinberg

"Cantor Weinberg is a special individual who has contributed to the Jewish community of Toronto not only as our cantor, but by selflessly helping those in need," Haberman wrote in the invitation to the gala.

"In our synagogue, he is known as Cantor Weinberg, and in our community he is known as a man with a kind heart, a soft word and a generous hand."

The "five-star dinner and dance" will honour Weinberg, but it will also raise money to improve the synagogue's 36-year-old building on Bathurst Street south of Steeles Avenue.

"We'll be celebrating my 18 years and raising funds to rejuvenate the sanctuary. I spend a lot of time there, and I really want to bring it back to life."

The event will feature speeches from shul members and rabbis, as well as friends and dignitaries such as Monte Kwinter, Ontario's minister of community safety and correctional services, but Weinberg insisted the night will be relatively low-key, because he doesn't enjoy being in the spotlight.

He said he hopes the event will be attended by "people who have had something to do with where I am today, both as a cantor and in my professional career.

"The relationships I've made throughout the 18 years have helped me grow."

He said he agreed to be the focus of the gala when he was approached by the shul's spiritual leader, Rabbi Robert Rhodes, and Larry Spring, its ritual director.

They convinced him to get behind the tribute dinner because he knows so many people in the community, both as a cantor and as a businessman, and is loved and respected.

He said he is proud to be a part of a congregation that he calls "one big family" and said that after 18 years, he appreciates the job more than ever.

"I'm more comfortable when I'm davening now, and more comfortable with people. I was a nervous wreck when I first started. I was fumbling over my teeth, I was so nervous.

"But the people have been so wonderful. I have a great relationship with the synagogue. I'm more relaxed now, and I feel like I'm getting more from it."

He explained that a celebratory event like this one is important because a person's life is not usually celebrated until they are finished living it.

"When someone passes on, we make eulogies and speeches about what a wonderful guy he was, but I've always said we have to celebrate people in life. I think it is important that we recognize good people in life."

Although he was initially reluctant to be the centre of attention, he is excited about the dinner.

"Chai is life and we intend to live it to the fullest."

Tickets cost $180. For more information, call 416-226-0111.

Halton Region's only synagogue marks 50 years

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Shaarei Beth-El, the only synagogue in Halton Region, is celebrating its 50th anniversary with a gala evening Nov. 12 titled "A Taste of Judaism."

The event will feature Jewish music, food from around the world and a commemorative program with pictures and stories.

Ken Tencer, president of the Oakville, Ont., shul, said it's a great opportunity to acknowledge the growth and sustainability of Halton's Jewish community.

"We're celebrating the accomplishment of a small community that began with six families 50 years ago," Tencer said.

Rabbi Paul Sidlofsky, Shaarei Beth-El 's spiritual leader for the past six years, said the shul evolved from two separate groups in Oakville and Burlington.

What began as a half dozen families from Burlington who gathered monthly to celebrate Jewish events in 1955 has turned into a partnership between two communities.

It wasn't until 1982 that the Burlington Jewish Community and the Beth El Congregation of Oakville built a small synagogue on Morrison Road in Oakville, and the shul has grown since then from a membership of 35 families to 150 families – and 500 people – today.

The shul belongs to the Union for Reform Judaism, an umbrella group with more than 900 congregations in North America.

Tencer explained that when you leave a major centre such as Toronto or Montreal for a town with a small Jewish population, the synagogue becomes the centre of the community.

"It is the focal point of the community. I think we need to showcase that," he said.

"The gala is about celebrating foods from many different Jewish cultures. There will be well over a dozen samplers."

As for music, Tencer said guests can expect a duo of a violinist and a pianist during the cocktail hour, and a band playing Klezmer and Israeli music throughout the night.

Special guests such as Halton Chief of Police Ean Algar, Oakville MP Bonnie Brown and representatives from various religious communities are scheduled to attend.

Rabbi Sidlofsky said the event is open to anyone who is interested in learning more about Judaism, and he was particularly hopeful Muslim representatives would attend so that the two communities "can build bridges."

Tencer and two other past presidents of the synagogue will each give a short speech, and guests will get a program outlining the history of the shul.

At $75 a ticket, Tencer said the evening is not a fundraiser. In fact, he said, the shul is struggling to break even on the event, but if there is a profit, the money will go to enhance the shul.

"This gala marks the milestone in the life of the Jewish community," Rabbi Sidlofsky said. "This is an opportunity to be part of the larger Halton community as well."

The rabbi said he works hard to raise the shul's profile among members and non-members.

"There are a lot of people in the Greater Toronto Area and Halton itself who are unaware that there is a synagogue in this area and the extent of our programs. It is important to convey how proud we are of it, and that we are welcoming to people who want to come as members or guests."

Democratization: Is It For Real?

Democratization of previously undemocratic or tyrannical societies is an idea in the air and an emerging reality in places on the ground. For some, this phenomenon is revolutionary and important; for others, democratization is American hubris at its worst. This series, featuring some of the most compelling voices of our time, examines this explosive and significant issue.

Senate bill tackles suicide bombing

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Senator Jerry Grafstein has introduced a bill to amend Canadian law to create a new criminal offence of "suicide bombing."

Bill S-43 would amend the Criminal Code's section on terrorism to include suicide bombing as part of its definition of terrorist activity. It would also bring Canada's domestic legislation in conformity with its international principles and practices, he said.

In moving second reading of the bill, Grafstein noted that the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) has over the last four years "consistently passed numerous resolutions condemning suicide bombings as a 'crime against humanity.'"

Canada is a member of the 55-country organization and it has "repeatedly supported resolutions declaring suicide bombing as a 'crime against humanity,'" said Grafstein, who serves as treasurer of the OSCE's parliamentary wing.

Passing the bill would clarify Canadian law and fill a gap in the Code, which has "no specific criminal offence of suicide bombing. A specific prohibition against suicide bombings would directly assist in prosecuting both those unsuccessful suicide bombers and those who individually conspire to assist in suicide bombings," Grafstein said.

"Our criminal law as it stands does not directly prohibit those who intentionally choose to lose their lives as a means of taking other or as many innocent lives as possible. If suicide bombing is tantamount to homicide, then the Criminal Code should eliminate any doubts whatsoever about this conduct as a criminal offence," he stated.

In earlier Senate sessions, Grafstein had recited the OSCE resolution on suicide bombing, noting that the international human rights body had agreed that suicide attacks constitute a crime against humanity.

If passed, the bill would be referred to the Senate's standing committee on legal and constitutional affairs. To become law, it would also have to be passed by the House of Commons.

Time for tough questions about Hamas

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

On Oct. 23, the Israeli media reported that the Israeli government had "softened" its stance against the participation of Hamas in Palestinian national elections scheduled for January. This was a reaction to U.S. President George W. Bush's decision not to push the Palestinian Authority to disarm Hamas until after the elections.

During an Oct. 20 meeting with PA President Mahmoud Abbas in Washington, Bush spoke of the PA's need to confront "the threat that armed gangs pose to a genuinely democratic Palestine." Yet, by refusing to press Abbas to disarm Hamas before the pending elections – under the assumption that Abbas is too weak or lacks the resolve to do so, but may be stronger afterward – Bush has contradicted himself on a matter of principle. It will be interesting to see if, in the coming weeks, journalists raise questions about this inconsistency.

Journalists should also refer to the internationally endorsed "road map" peace plan, which states explicitly that the goal of Palestinian statehood "can be achieved when the Palestinian people have a leadership acting decisively against terror, willing and able to build a practising democracy based on tolerance and liberty."

Tolerance and liberty, however, are precisely what Hamas and other Islamic extremist groups do not respect. Indeed, Hamas rejects these democratic values, often violently. Therefore, the issue isn't merely that Hamas won't disarm prior to the elections, but that Hamas shows no intention of renouncing its covenant, which calls for both Israel's destruction and for the murder of Jews. Article 7 states: "The day of judgment will not come about until Muslims fight Jews and kill them."

Endorsing the anti-Semitic forgery the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, Hamas, in Article 32, accuses Jews of controlling the "world media" and of having been behind the French and Russian revolutions. Article 22 blames the Jews for both World War I and World War II, "through which they [the Jews] made huge financial gains."

No wonder the UN Commission on Human Rights has condemned Hamas as a racist organization. Then again, according to Hamas, Jews formed the UN's predecessor, the League of Nations, "through which they could rule the world."

Some liberal media analysts have argued that if Hamas is brought into the Palestinian political process, it will moderate its views and assume ordinary political responsibilities.

But nearly all Israeli analysts, even the most liberal, are deeply skeptical that an extremist religious organization that carries out terrorist acts against Israeli civilians and calls for genocide can be a responsible party in a democratic process.

Again, it will be the task of journalists to ask tough questions of Hamas officials leading up to the Palestinian elections.

In his Aug. 18 interview with the pan-Arab daily Asharq Al-Awsat (translation by MEMRI), Al-Zahar defended incitement against Jews: "Even if the Qur'an attacks the Jews in some of its verses, the people must read it. We cannot agree to the manipulation of the Qur'an and the religion." On the possibility of future accommodation with Israel, his view was also categorical: "We do not and will not recognize a state called Israel. Israel has no right to any inch of Palestinian land… Our position stems from our religious convictions."

Clearly, if Hamas intends to be part of a "democratic" process, it's the responsibility of reporters to question how this organization plans, if at all, to square this participation with its extremist, rejectionist record.

Posters depict common Israeli, Canadian values

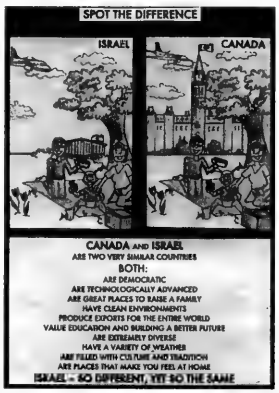
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Morton Katz, an architect and former professor at University of Toronto is the first-place winner in Canada-Israel Committee's advocacy poster competition.

His poster, titled Birds of a Feather, along with posters created by second-place winner Sheera Minkowitz, and third-place winner Leonard Smith, will be displayed in public venues across Canada.

Winners received Israel bonds that were donated by State of Israel Bonds Canada.

Judy Zelikovitz, Greater Toronto Area programming co-ordinator of the Canada-Israel Committee, said the contest was part of CIC's ongoing Israel-awareness campaign directed at Canadians unfamiliar with Israel beyond the conflict.



2nd place winner
Sheera Minkowitz

Rules of the contest, open to Canadian residents 14 years and older, stated that posters should present a fresh image of Israel, and could highlight the common values of Canadians and Israelis or showcase Israel's innovations and contributions to the world.

Katz, who studied sculpture and architecture in the Canadian Arctic, Alaska, Siberia, Europe, Asia and North and South America, is past president of the Sculptors' Society of Canada and has had more than 30 sculpture exhibitions, including one at the Canadian embassy in Tokyo in 2001.

He has painting and photograph exhibits in Canada, United States and Europe, and recently returned from London, England, where one of his large sculptures will be installed at the London School of Economics.

Katz is also a winner of an international competition for the creation of a Holocaust memorial in Nebraska.

He challenged himself to enter the contest, he said, after attending a bat mitzvah in Chicago and hearing the rabbi speak in "vengeful terms" of the situation in Israel. "It disturbed me to hear him talk like that. Those who endorse that reaction do harm."

To create his poster, he used origami to make birds out of a Maple Leaf and a Star of David.

Minkowitz, 19, a student at York University, spent a year studying in Israel and said that when she came home she realized how little people really know about the country.

"All we know is what people see in the media – a war-torn country. I felt safe and at home there, and I want people to know that Israelis have the same values as us."

3rd place winner
Leonard Smith

Her poster titled Spot the Difference depicts two families enjoying a picnic. The only difference is that there is an Israeli flag and an El Al plane flying in one picture and a Canadian flag and an Air Canada plane flying in the other.

Smith, a "self-thought" artist named his poster Democratic Values in Full Bloom. In it, a single flower pot has a Canadian flag and half of a Maple leaf, and an Israeli flag and half of a Magen David. "I tried to show that democracy blooms similarly in both countries," he said.

'Street smart' dropout publishes third book

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jack Gelman is a writer, poet, community worker, entrepreneur and comedian who did not finish Grade 8.

The 76-year-old has published his third book, a tongue-in-cheek memoir titled One Year at a Time. Gelman is currently working on a fourth book, a volume of poetry, to be published early in 2006.

His first two books, Jack Gelman's Collection of Yiddish Words, and Yiddish: A Two Way Street, are a reflection of his life-long love affair with the Yiddish language.

The 76-year-old Gelman, who has dyslexia, says that most people with a learning disability in the 1930s, when there was no diagnosis or help available, would have faced failure in life.

Jack Gelman

Alvin Abram, an author and publisher who has attention deficit disorder, describes Gelman as "a puzzle, a riddle, a paradox – he is a gutte neshoma. Jack is the most educated person I know. He is street smart. That's the hardest subject to learn."

Gelman looks at reality as a challenge to be met with hard work and, above all, with a sense of humour.

In an interview, he spoke of his marriage of 54 years to Esther, his four children and 11 grandchildren and his wonderful group of friends.

Gelman is a semi-retired businessman who began his association with the paper industry in 1948. In 1954, he and his wife opened Jack in the Box restaurant, which they operated for five years, before he returned to the paper industry. He founded his own company in 1968.

He begins One Year at a Time in 1929, opening with a vignette titled The Agony and the Ecstasy – My Bris.

In some 100 chronologically arranged short stories of his life experiences, he brings the reader from 1929 through to 2005.

People born in the 1920s, '30s and '40s, will relate to Gelman's reflections. Those born after 1950 will appreciate his clear and humorous picture of years of poverty, teenage foibles, College Street and Spadina Avenue, "where all the night action occurred," Crystal Beach, the Darling Lunch at 96 Spadina Ave., marriage and raising a family.

Gelman is a standup Yiddish comedian and raconteur. He says, "I try to infuse every conversation with a few jokes."

If you see a car with the licence plate JG POET, you will know that Gelman's sense of humour even extends to his car.

"My philosophy is that I try not to complain. I try to finish every day with a funny ending. I drive my wife crazy doing silly things and she goes along with it. She never gets mad. I try out every joke on her and she is my sounding board," he says.

Gelman was born on Oct. 28, the day before the stock market crashed. "I was the last good thing that came out before the crash of the 29th," he says.

He grew up on Baldwin Street, in Kensington Market, where his parents operated a fruit and vegetable store from 1928 to '55.

He attended Ryerson Public School to Grade 7 and says that everything else he learned he taught himself. "My education is from the school of the streets, where I graduated with honours."

Gelman says that if he wasn't good at something, he tried to do it another way. "If I wasn't a good athlete, I coached and managed a basketball team, hockey and baseball."

Winnipeg's Jewish mayor remains popular

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

WINNIPEG — What a week Sam Katz was having. A few days after the Winnipeg Free Press published a story suggesting the city's mayor may have been involved in a conflict of interest, a local polling company reported Katz's popularity was at near record levels.

Granted, the polling preceded news of the alleged conflict, but at 76 per cent, His Worship's approval rating would have to drop mightily to affect his chances of re-election next year.

Since assuming the mayor's mantle in a byelection in June 2004, Katz has rankled his left-leaning opponents on city council and perturbed those who oppose his pro-development agenda.

But the people of River City, where the Red and Assiniboine rivers meet, seem to have embraced Katz and his platform wholeheartedly.

Prior to release of the polling results, Katz had embarked on a cost-cutting, pro-business program of privatizing garbage collection in parts of the city (saving $2.7 million per year), establishing a red tape commission to study ways of reducing bureaucracy, modifying an expensive plan for rapid transit and lobbying for federal gas tax money to be spent on improving roads – a position that polls show is popular among Winnipeggers.

On other issues, the mayor has elicited vocal opposition. His controversial plan to lease a parking lot in a city park so developers can build condominiums has split the electorate. Some agree the move would generate tax revenues to upgrade the park, while others fear the move favours the rich to the detriment of others.

But it was his vote (as part of a unanimous council decision) to grant a restaurant permit to a company associated with friends, who also have a business relationship with Katz's Winnipeg Goldeyes baseball team, that prompted the Free Press story.

For his part, Katz maintains he sought legal advice and was told his vote would not offend conflict of interest guidelines.

Proving naysayers wrong is nothing new for the 54-year-old mayor. Prior to embarking on a career in public service, he made a name for himself in, let's say, serving the public.

One of his first business ventures was in running a social hall in a former racquet club. He also operated a music production company and booked into Winnipeg A-list rock acts such as the Rolling Stones, Pink Floyd, Paul McCartney and Tina Turner. In addition, he was involved in basketball and baseball exhibitions, planning the Sunfest festival in Gimli, a 60-kilometre drive north of Winnipeg, and in bringing a Northern League baseball franchise, the Goldeyes, to Winnipeg.

All along the way, he said, many doubted his ability to follow through on his ambitious plans. When he first began booking major performers, people in Los Angeles would say "'Winnipeg where? and Sam who?'" he recalled.

He remained undeterred: "There's no question I like challenges, and I like to prove that something can be done when people say it can't be done."

A pitcher and shortstop as a youth, Katz said that running a baseball club is something he particularly enjoys. "I tell people, I don't work… I really enjoy what I'm doing."

Intends to make sure 'we'll treat everyone fairly'

It was while promoting construction of a baseball park near the Forks of the Red and Assiniboine Rivers that Katz really got a bad taste of municipal politics.

When pushing for his vision of the park, he ran into roadblocks at city hall and felt he was not treated "equally." As mayor, he intends to make sure "we'll treat everyone fairly at city hall."

Though Katz's name had been mentioned as a possible candidate in previous campaigns, he had resisted the call. He said he changed his mind when he concluded that you can "be part of the problem or the solution, and if you don't do anything, you're part of the problem."

Another factor was the short 2½-year term. His predecessor, Glen Murray, left the office to run for Parliament in 2004 (he lost).

Katz's candidacy was announced only two hours before the nominations deadline, and he ran a two-week campaign against candidates who had been campaigning for months.

Of the nine candidates, Katz was the only "non-politician" running. "I was the true independent. I was not affiliated with any party."

He promised to "do some housecleaning" at city hall and pare down expenses – such as contracting out garbage collection at $40 a house versus city workers' cost of $70 a house.

Katz's candidacy sparked the second largest turnout ever for a mayoralty race and he won the race handily with 42.5 per cent of the vote, becoming the city's first-ever Jewish mayor.

He credits his victory to the unexpected involvement of voters between the ages of 18 and 30, who he said appreciate his can-do attitude and his private sector accomplishments that have made Winnipeg a better city to live.

Quebec author's tale becomes a Spielberg film

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Once upon a time there was a little boy named Louis who had trouble falling asleep. His father, Marc Levy, couldn't stand seeing his son so unhappy at bedtime, so he began to tell him stories. Every night, he came up with a new chapter. One day, Marc decided to put all his stories into manuscript form. In 2000, his sister, a scriptwriter, convinced him to send his story collection to Paris-based editor Robert Laffont. What happened next is the real fairy tale.

An unknown in literary circles, Levy, then 38, quickly became recognized worldwide.

His first novel, Et si c'était vrai... (Robert Laffont), has been translated into 32 languages. Known in English as If This Were Only True, the book has sold some three million copies internationally. And, for the icing on the cake, Steven Spielberg called Levy in the middle of the night to buy the rights to the book for $2 million (US).

Three more novels followed – all best-sellers. In total, more than five million copies of Levy's first three novels have been sold, and the former architect is now the most widely read writer in France. His books, which are selling like hotcakes, are available in 30 countries.

Steven Spielberg's DreamWorks production company has released a film version of Et si c'était vrai..., a romantic comedy now in movie theatres – Just Like Heaven. It is directed by Mark Waters, and stars Reese Witherspoon and Mark Ruffalo. The film tells the improbable love story of a beautiful female ghost and the only man who can see her.

Is he satisfied with the American film adaptation of Et si c'était vrai..., a movie that cost $75 million (US) to produce?

"Yes, I'm pleased with the way it turned out," he said in an interview. "I didn't expect to find all the pages of my novel in the film. I enjoyed the movie. It's a very nice comedy based on the story in my novel. The film expresses the vision of another author who wanted to tell the story in his own way. The filmmakers even added some ideas that I would have loved to have used in my novel. They really knew how to recreate the mutual attraction that brought together the main characters in the novel. Overall it is a very enjoyable film with a very American ending. But by the same token, if a French director bought an American novel, he would make a French film."

The successful author, who was affable and generous with his time, does not claim to be a "literary great," but rather sees himself as an "artisan, a storyteller." He smiles a little when asked if there is a Marc Levy "recipe" for success.

"I realize that I've been lucky. I get up every morning and tell myself that it's incredible. But I don't have any miracle 'recipe.' You'll find themes in my books that mean a great deal to me. And I have a desire to tell beautiful stories. I think a person who writes books, composes music or paints pictures ends up making his own mark. It makes sense that there is a common thread in all my novels. I like to tell stories that break cultural barriers. I can't stand the idea of barriers. For me, the story of a man and a woman who love each other passionately is no more French than it is Canadian or Italian... The most beautiful thing in the universe is truly two people who love each other – no? My novels don't have any hidden moralizing messages, just one main theme: individual generosity."

Levy also has another passion. In 2004, he produced his first short film La Lettre de Nabilia, sponsored by Amnesty International, in which he strongly denounced the attacks on human freedom in Third World countries. In the spring of 2006, he will produce his first feature-length film in France and England.

Does he consider himself a politically committed writer?

"Frankly, making a short for Amnesty International or being involved in organizing a charity event doesn't make you committed. You can't be committed until you are right there in the areas where the tragedies are taking place. I am on the board of an organization called Action contre la faim (Action Against Hunger). I admire the remarkable work the ACF people do on the ground in Africa, in Haiti... They are the ones who are really committed. When you are on the board of directors of a humanitarian organization, you are not committed, you are just helping, in a small way, to do a humanitarian task. It would be very presumptuous of me to claim that I am a committed writer because I made a short film in a Saint-Cloud park in Paris."

French critics have not been kind to Levy. Most of them hate his books. But their opinions leave him unmoved.

"My unexpected success has caused some jealousy. But that's fair enough. I have never had any literary pretensions. Still, I find it sad to see jealousy in people. I really don't care what the critics say about me. They can be quite savage. The only thing I want is to share my story, which is a fairy tale. I know from the huge amount of mail I get every day, that my literary success has given a lot of people a desire to believe in fairy tales, and to want to write. I want to share these moments of happiness with my readers. The advantage of not having a huge ego is that when you are praised to the skies, it doesn't turn your head, and when the reviews are very negative, it doesn't get to you either."

Levy is not offended when critics describe him as a "popular writer."

"Alexandre Dumas, a great genius of literature to whom I do not presume to compare myself, was also considered a popular writer. When The Three Musketeers came out, the critics tore it to pieces – and you know the rest," he said.

Levy's novels have been translated into Hebrew, and he has many readers in Israel.

"I have visited Israel several times," he said. "But never to do a promotion. It's a captivating country, one that I like and where I have some close friends."

His support was not limited to the business community, he said. "Blue-collar people support me as working for the little guy."

The son of Holocaust survivors, Katz was born in Rehovot, Israel. The family moved to Canada when he was less than six months old. His father, Chaim, who survived Buchenwald, worked as a baker, and his mother, Zena, a survivor of Stutthof and Buchenwald, worked in a baker shop.

Katz grew up in Winnipeg's north end, studied economics in university (his mother wanted him to be a dentist) and soon after started his first business, a clothing store in the western Manitoba city of Brandon.

His agenda as mayor is clearly pro-private enterprise: "I simply want to make Winnipeg a better place to live. I want people to know Winnipeg is open for business, that business is not the enemy and profit is not a dirty word."

So far, Katz's message seems to be what Winnipeggers want to hear. Despite all the criticism, he's gratified that so many voters approve of his performance.

Although he hasn't made up his mind about the next election – rumours are he will run again – he said he's not concerned if voters one day change their minds about him.

"I have the luxury that if I'm not elected, I have something wonderful waiting for me," he said. "We'll do what we think is right, not necessarily what will get me votes."

Gelman writes third book

He is a past president of North York lodge, B'nai Brith, from which he received the man of the year award in 1984 and was a recipient of the Tower of David Award for his dedicated work with the State of Israel Bonds.

He adds, "I was the only president of North York lodge that wasn't a professional."

Gelman says that early in life he learned that one shouldn't become addicted to a business. "There is more to life than business." In One Year at a Time, he clearly shows his joie de vivre.

The book is available at Israel's The Judaica Centre, Negev Importing, Steeles Deli and at Gelennalan Motors, which Gelman notes, "Is owned by my two sons, Glenn and Alan.

"And I also have two daughters, Sharon Bonder and Mandy Smith. That's why I smile all the time."

Community Commemoration of Kristallnacht

Wednesday, November 9 – 7:30 pm

Adath Israel Congregation
37 Southbourne Avenue, Toronto

On November 9-10, 1938, the Nazis unleashed a wave of unprecedented and unrestrained violence against the Jews of Germany and Austria. In just a few hours, 30,000 Jewish men and boys were transported to concentration camps. Thousands of synagogues, Jewish businesses and homes were destroyed. Kristallnacht, the Night of Broken Glass, signaled the beginning of the Holocaust.

Please join the community for a special evening to commemorate the 67th anniversary of Kristallnacht, to honour the Holocaust survivors and pay tribute to their liberators at this closing program of Holocaust Education Week.

Web-based journal reaches out to Jewish students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A new web-based journal that aims to reach Jewish students and get them involved in the community is accepting submissions for its first issue.

Hyla Korn, 23, a graduate student studying religion at the University of Toronto, and Joe Heller, an undergraduate student at the University of Western Ontario majoring in English, are the co-editors of the Student Journal of Canadian Jewish Studies, which is being sponsored by the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies (ICJS) at Montreal's Concordia University.

"The purpose of the journal is to foster and familiarize young Jews with the field of Canadian Jewish studies. It is a journal meant to illustrate the Jewish experience in Canada," Korn said.

The first edition is expected to appear in March.

Korn said she and Heller realized that an effort needed to be made to engage young Jews in the community when they noticed they were the only two young people speaking at the ICJS conference at Western earlier this year.

They pitched the idea for a student journal, and the institute agreed to sponsor and fund the initiative as long as Korn and Heller agreed to edit it.

Deciding that this would be a great forum for students to explore and learn about their Jewish heritage and culture, they jumped at the opportunity.

"A journal of this kind has yet to be explored. There is nothing about the Canadian Jewish experience," Korn said. "In that sense, the question is why there is so much documentation of the American experience and not the Canadian experience.

"We felt this was a neglected area of study, and there is a need for it."

In an effort to correct this imbalance, the journal hopes to provide a forum for graduate and undergraduate papers, as well as articles and book reviews, from any discipline relating to the Jewish experience in Canada.

She added that while the hope is for academic papers and articles, it's unlikely she and Heller will reject any submissions as long as they relate in some way to the Jewish experience in Canada.

The idea is that the more student submissions they receive, the more successful the project will be, she said.

The editors will accept submissions from students in undergraduate or graduate programs, and while they don't have to be attending a Canadian university or college, papers must be about a Canadian subject.

In addition to contributing to the promotion of Jewish life in Canada, each writer will receive a stipend, but Korn said it's too early to say how much it will be.

In the journal's first year, it will only be published online. In the future, depending on the success of the project, Korn hopes they will be able to turn it into a hard copy journal.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Foodies share their best fare

By NORENE GILLETZ

If you love Jewish food and recipes, you are not alone. This summer, 16 foodie-friends (including yours truly) gathered at a restaurant in Toronto to eat, shmooze and exchange recipes. This was the third get-together of members of the Jewish Food list (www.jewishfood-list.com), which has grown to nearly 1,800 members from all around the world since it began in April 1999.

Some members post on a regular basis, while others are "lurkers" looking for ideas on what to make for dinner. Questions and answers to all kinds of cooking questions abound, from what and how much of each dish to serve at a Sheva Brachot party, to what to do with an abundance of blueberries.

Shayla Goldstein, one of the recipe archivists and an active member of the list, is expecting her first baby in October. She welcomed helpful suggestions on what could be prepared in advance and frozen. Goldstein, aided by Tolsa Greenberg, did an excellent job of organizing this year's get-together. As requested, we each brought copies of a favourite recipe that hadn't been posted on the list before. We were provided with a folder to store them in for our future enjoyment. After dinner, a sheet was passed around and everyone marked down what they had ordered, along with their "restaurant review."

Earlier that day, Shayna Kravetz was a bit concerned; she was attending for the first time and didn't know the other attendees. Not a problem – food was the common connector, turning virtual strangers into a virtual community. Kravetz recently described a "nightmare yom tov" with eight guests, including vegetarians, no-wheat, no-meat, no-garlic, no-citrus, no-fish, low-carb and low-fat – oy! Her solution? She served the vegetarians half a small squash each, baked and then filled with kasha pilaf, making a hearty main dish. She also prepared vegetarian-safe side dishes that everyone shared in. A food maven, for sure!

After much deliberation, I decided to offer readers Denise Levin's Cheddar Broccoli Rosti, Fran Woolf's fabulous meat rolls and Shayla Goldstein's mom's scrumptious chocolate pie. Enjoy!

FRAN WOOLF'S FABULOUS PUFF PASTRY MEAT-FILLED ROLL

2 large onions, diced
4 oz. chopped mushrooms
½ of a red pepper
1 lb. ground chicken, veal or lean beef
½ tsp. mixed herbs (your choice)
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1½ tbsp. flour
½ cup soya milk
1 can corn niblets, drained (optional)
salt and pepper to taste
frozen puff pastry

Saute onions, mushrooms and red pepper until softened. Add meat and brown. Stir well to break up the meat and add the herbs and lemon juice. If using corn, add now.

Sprinkle on the flour and stir in well. Add the soya milk gradually and stir until thickened. Let cool overnight or for a few hours in fridge until completely cold.

Roll out puff pastry to desired length; cut and put a thick layer of meat at the bottom of each piece. Roll one and a half times. Place roll on parchment-covered cookie sheet, seam-side down. Repeat with the rest of the meat and puff pastry. Leave a space between the rolls.

Slash each of the rolls on a diagonal every 1½ inches. This will make slicing easier. At this point, you can freeze the rolls. When frozen, wrap well.

Apply egg wash and sprinkle with sesame seeds. Bake at 450 for 10 minutes. Turn down oven and bake at 375 for 20 to 25 minutes.

DENISE LEVIN'S CHEDDAR BROCCOLI ROSTI

3 tbsp. oil
1 small onion, diced
1 small red pepper, diced
12 oz. broccoli (heads only), coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. water
1 tsp. salt
2½ lb. baking potatoes
¼ tsp. black pepper
4 oz. cheddar cheese (1 cup grated)

Heat 1 tbsp. of the oil in a large skillet. Fry the onion and red pepper for 6 to 7 minutes. Stir in broccoli, water and salt. Cover and cook for 3 to 4 minutes. Transfer to a bowl.

Preheat oven to 400. Peel and shred potatoes. Toss with salt and pepper.

In the same skillet, heat remaining 2 tbsp. oil. When very hot, add half of the shredded potatoes. Top with broccoli mixture. Sprinkle with grated cheddar. Top with remaining potatoes.

Cook for 10 minutes. Carefully flip over. Bake uncovered in preheated oven for 10 minutes. (Remember to cover handles of skillet with aluminum foil.) Yields 4 to 6 servings.

SHAYLA GOLDSTEIN'S MOM'S CHOCOLATE PECAN PIE

¼ cup sugar
1 cup corn or golden syrup
½ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. flour
3 eggs
2 tbsp. butter or margarine
3 oz. unsweetened chocolate
1½ tsp. vanilla
1¾ cup pecan halves
9-in. pie shell, unbaked

Mix sugar, syrup, salt, flour and eggs; beat with a mixer until well combined.

Melt butter and chocolate together in a saucepan. Stir often to avoid burning. When melted and combined, add vanilla and stir.

Fold pecan halves into the chocolate mixture. Then mix that mixture with the first mixture. Stir until combined.

Pour into pie shell. Bake at 300 for 60 minutes or until set. It will appear cracked on top. This is very rich, so slice into very thin slices. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

The son of Righteous Gentile Selahattin Ulkumen moved some to tears and all to a standing ovation when he spoke on behalf of his father, who saved 42 Jewish families when the Nazis occupied Rhodes in Greece in 1944.

Part of the Holocaust Education Week organized by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, the program, "The Sephardi Experience of the Holocaust," honoured a man who risked his life to save his fellow man, and addressed the misconception that Sephardi Jews were largely unaffected by the Holocaust.

Before Mehmet Ulkumen took the stage, Elsie Menasce, author of The Sephardi Culinary Tradition – which offers both historical accounts and cooking traditions of the Jewish community of Rhodes – said the island was like a little shtetl and had a vibrant Jewish community before it was destroyed by the Nazis.

> 'Jews and others were sent to their deaths simply because of their beliefs and their ethnicity'

Ulkumen, the chief of protocol of the Protocol and Liaison Services at the United Nations, described the apathy and indifference that Jews faced when the Nazis threatened to send them to death camps.

"Jews and others were sent to their deaths – men, women, children, young and old – simply because of their beliefs and their ethnicity. Yet much of mankind simply stood by and watched the suffering people being swallowed up by hatred and cruelty," Ulkumen said.

His father and mother, he explained, were not the kind of people who could stand idly by while people suffered.

"They saw the betrayal of God, the treachery of man and the fall of humanity," he said.

"They also saw how man could kill his own neighbour, simply because of religion."

He said that with the support of his wife, Selahattin, the first non-Christian to receive the Righteous Among the Nations award, did everything he could to save the Jews of Rhodes from the gas chambers in Poland.

"He stood up, not as a hero, not as a diplomat, not as a Muslim nor as a Turk, but as a man answering God's call to protect his brother. A call that would affect the life of the person closest to him, my mother."

He explained that as the Jews of Rhodes, almost 2,000 people, were rounded up and stuffed into cattle cars to be deported to Poland, his father, the Turkish consul general at the time, argued that under Turkish laws, and according to a treaty between Germany and Turkey, Jews, Muslims and Christians were treated as equals, and Turkish citizens and their spouses could not be deported.

The Nazis were obligated to comply, but told him if he wanted the Jews back in Rhodes, he would have to sail them in on fishing boats at his expense.

In retaliation to this concession, they bombed the Turkish consulate, fatally wounding Selahattin's wife, who just a week earlier, had given birth to their son.

Mehmet said that despite the effect his father's actions had on his life and the lives of those he loved most, he simply didn't have another option.

"My father could not have made any other decision. [Helping Jews] wasn't just the right thing, but the only thing to do," Ulkumen told an attentive audience of 300.

"We always used to say, 'We Muslims are like Jews. We share the same father, the same God. We also share the same belief that… he who saves a single man saves a whole world.' And it was this belief that compelled him to save Jews during World War II."

Despite his father's best efforts, the Jews of Rhodes were still subject to maltreatment by the Gestapo.

Although the story he told was based on inhumanity and cruelty, Ulkumen's intention was to inspire people to act in the face of hatred and intolerance.

"When I look at this audience of Jews, Muslims and Christians and others, and as I relate my father's story, I am both awed and inspired," he said.

"It is our task to ensure that our voices are heard and truly understood by the silent majority and not stifled by those who preach hatred and intolerance."

Zundel to face trial in Germany

CJN News Services

BERLIN — Ernst Zundel, who has been held in a German jail since being deported from Canada last March, will go on trial Nov. 8 in the city of Mannheim on charges of inciting racial hatred.

A longtime white supremacist and Nazi apologist, Zundel is accused of denying the Holocaust – a crime in Germany – in documents and on his website.

From his former home in downtown Toronto, Zundel distributed large amounts of Holocaust-denial documents around the world. He controlled a website – called the "Zundelsite" – based in the United States and available in Germany, that also published materials questioning the Holocaust.

In 2002, a Canadian Human Rights Tribunal found that material on the Zundelsite "viciously targeted" and "vilified" Jews."

The tribunal ordered Zundel to remove the offending material, but he had moved to Tennessee by the time the tribunal issued its ruling. He was deported back to Canada after overstaying a visitor's visa and spent two years in custody as federal authorities sought to remove him as a security threat. He was deported in March.

Last week in Prague, the capital of the Czech Republic, about 60 right-wing extremists marched in front of the German embassy protesting Zundel's incarceration. A larger group of 150 counter-protesters rallied to oppose the neo-Nazi group.

Holocaust Education Week

Holocaust survivors seen as models for children

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Only a decade ago, Holocaust education was not a formal part of the curriculum in most European schools.

Today, the situation is vastly different.

Some 35 European countries officially educate and commemorate the Shoah by holding Holocaust Memorial Day ceremonies and infusing curriculum with related programs and projects.

A major catalyst for these endeavours is Shulamit Imber, director of education at the International School for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

Imber helped author an official guideline for Holocaust educators in Europe and recently discussed her experiences in a lecture at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, kicking off the 25th annual Holocaust Education Week.

She emphasized the importance of educators imbuing their students with the understanding that the lessons of the Holocaust are universal ones for all humanity.

"Clearly, it is important to explain [to educators they should be] teaching and remembering… the Holocaust as a human story…not [merely] a Jewish affair," Imber said.

That humanistic paradigm resonated with a student of Imber's – a headmaster at a school in Hungary – who returned home from Yad Vashem training to organize Holocaust Memorial Day events, including real-life interviews with survivors.

"The students interviewed survivors about the moral dilemmas they faced during the Holocaust," Imber said.

"Most survivors said their dilemma was that they could get out [of Hungary], but they didn't want to leave their parents behind."

Imber is a huge proponent of survivor interviews, noting more and more survivors are willing to share their painful pasts with students.

She said Canada has many survivors and noted they can help students truly appreciate how people who suffered so much still found the will to live and prosper.

"Most survivors after the Holocaust were very involved in community life," she said.

"This is a model for our children to learn from."

Holocaust education is also a powerful vehicle to confront anti-Semitism, Imber said.

"When we teach about the Holocaust, we have to… encourage students to understand what anti-Semitism is and how to do something about it," she said.

"In education, we can take meaning of the Holocaust to actually doing."

In teaching educators from both North America and Europe, Imber has observed nuances between the groups, noting the Europeans often grapple with guilt, since their relatives were in some cases perpetrators or collaborators.

"It's very difficult for them because they feel a sense of blame," Imber said.

"But there is a difference between blame and responsibility. No country should be blamed, but they have to learn their history honestly to take responsibility for the future."

That same idea applies to students, she said.

"Students can't do anything to mend the past," she offered.

"But education is about hope and by doing these projects, I think you can lead to a better future."

Amphitheatre to seat 150-200

A sunken amphitheatre will seat 150-200 people. It will be ringed by A Wall of Remembrance inscribed with names of Jewish war veterans from the world over, while the Wall of Honour opposite will carry the names of important battles in which Jews have fought, including those in Israel. The flags of 30 Allied nations will fly, as will insignia of several branches of the Canadian Armed Forces.

The Chanukah theme is designed to remind Jews of their resistance against oppression and their historic struggle for freedom, Libeskind wrote recently.

Organizers say it will serve as a meeting place for educational programs and on Remembrance Day, and hope it will be completed in 12 to 16 months.

Miller and other speakers cited the Canadian Jewish contribution to both world wars: 4,000 Jews served in World War I, with 100 killed; in World War II, 423 died of the 17,000 who served – the highest percentage of service of any Canadian ethnic group in that conflict.

But keynote speaker retired Maj.-Gen. Lewis MacKenzie said the figures for World War II tell an even more impressive story when expressed a different way.

After one eliminates those too young, too old or unfit to serve from the roughly 80,000 Jewish males in Canada at the time, the figure is closer to two out of every three eligible Jews who volunteered to fight. "Now that's a number," MacKenzie said to applause.

MacKenzie, who led troops from 31 nations in peacekeeping operations during the Bosnian civil war, also drew cheers when he called on Ottawa to increase funding for Canada's armed forces "before the military implodes."

Among the politicians and dignitaries who attended or addressed the groundbreaking were Moshe Ronen, representing the project's honorary chair, Onex CEO Gerald Schwartz; senators Jerry Grafstein, Vivienne Poy and Art Eggleton; Ken Dryden, minister of social development; Thornhill MP Susan Kadis; Jason Kenney, deputy house leader of the Conservative party; Ontario's minister of community safety and correctional services, Monte Kwinter; Ontario Conservative leader John Tory; and Toronto deputy mayor Mike Feldman.

Greetings were read from Ontario Lieut.-Gov. James Bartleman; Premier Dalton McGuinty; national defence minister Bill Graham; veterans affairs minister Albina Guarnieri; and Conservative party foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day.

Master of ceremonies was Joel Wagman, the project's chair.

Also on hand were representatives from the Toronto Police Service, the Ontario Provincial Police, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, sea and air cadets and about 100 members of the army's 32 Canadian Brigade Group, the army reserve in Toronto.

MacKenzie, half-jokingly, urged fundraisers for the memorial to pursue the grandchildren of veterans.

"Don't let them get away without a significant contribution," he said.

The $7-million campaign includes a $2-million endowment fund for maintenance and upkeep.

Survivors' memoirs chronicle the Holocaust

By MENACHEM Z. ROSENSAFT

Guest Voice

In 1942, Jadzia Szpigelman, now Jane Lipski, was a 17-year-old member of the Jewish resistance in the ghetto of Bedzin, Poland. The following year, after her family had been deported to Auschwitz, she managed to escape to Slovakia where she met her future husband. Soviet partisans took them to Moscow to be honoured as heroes, but imprisoned them instead. She never saw her husband again. Jane bore her son in a Soviet prison and miraculously, they both survived.

At the outbreak of World War II, 16-year-old Margit Raab and her family fled their home in Czech Silesia and went to eastern Poland. After her father was killed in a bombraid, the family fled westward to Tarnow, where the Gestapo killed Margit's mother. Margit was deported first to the Plaszow labour camp, from there to Auschwitz, and ultimately to Bergen-Belsen where she was liberated.

Isabelle Choko was an adolescent in the Lodz ghetto before being imprisoned at Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen, where her mother died in her arms shortly before the liberation.

As a teenager, Frances Irwin survived two years in Auschwitz-Birkenau and a death march to Mauthausen.

The women's memoirs are being published this fall by Yad Vashem and the Holocaust Survivors' Memoirs Project in Stolen Youth, Five Women's Survival in the Holocaust.

"These five stories provide insights into what it meant to be a young Jewish woman enduring the worst during the Holocaust," writes Dr. David Silberklang, the series editor, in his foreword to the book. "Certainly, other Jews, regardless of gender, shared much of what these women describe. At the same time, issues that were specifically feminine are addressed in these memoirs – whether the beginnings of awareness of young men in one memoir or marrying and bearing a son in another. Reading personal accounts from five different female viewpoints in one book is a rare and enlightening experience."

Stolen Youth is the seventh volume published by the Holocaust Survivors' Memoirs Project, initially with the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, and, since August 2004, with Yad Vashem, Israel's national institution for the remembrance and study of the Holocaust.

As Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel has observed, "The Holocaust must never be studied exclusively from the perspective of the perpetrators. Each survivor's story is unique, and adds to our understanding of the Holocaust and the understanding of future generations."

Collectively, these memoirs provide a sense of both the diversity of European Jewry and the commonality of their fate, as is evident from some of the other stories published by the Holocaust Survivors' Memoirs Project.

Guarded by Angels, How My Father and Uncle Survived Hitler and Cheated Stalin by Alan Elsner, is the dramatic story of two young Jews who were forced to flee their home in southern Poland in 1939, only to be arrested by Soviet authorities in Lvov the following year and transported to labour camps north of the Arctic Circle. Released after 18 months, they travelled thousands of miles across the Soviet Union, passing through Central Asia, before finding refuge in a Cossack village in the Caucasus, surviving six months of Nazi occupation and participating in the Soviet advance through Poland and into Germany as draftees in a Polish brigade of the Red Army.

In By Leaps and Bounds, Margaret Bergmann Lambert writes how, although recognized as one of Germany's best young athletes, she was first excluded from organized sports and the university system by the Nazi regime because she was Jewish, and then forced to participate in the 1936 Berlin Olympics but ultimately barred from competing.

In Yesterday: My Story, Hadassah Rosensaft describes her last moments with her 5½-year-old son at Auschwitz-Birkenau, how she and a group of fellow inmates kept 149 Jewish children alive in Bergen-Belsen under unspeakable conditions, her historic testimony at the first trial of Nazi war criminals, and her experiences as one of the leaders of the survivors in the Bergen-Belsen displaced persons camp.

In Days of Rain, Enzo Tayar chronicles how the tranquillity of his Florence boyhood was replaced by fear and uncertainty as Italy instituted increasingly severe anti-Jewish measures and the Germans invaded their former ally. Drawing on the diary he kept for the pivotal year 1943, he describes his escape from Florence and his finding refuge on a succession of farms throughout Tuscany.

Launched by a grant from Random House, Inc. at the initiative of Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust Survivors' Memoirs Project collects and preserves, for scholars and the wider public, the autobiographical written accounts of Holocaust survivors. The books published by the project are a resource for all who seek to explore and understand the Jewish people's tragic recent past.

Our goal is to have these memoirs integrated into high school, university and adult education curricula to provide both the Jewish victims of the Holocaust and the survivors the dignity of a permanent historical presence, not as impersonal statistics but as individual protagonists with names, voices and emotions. The books are available on Amazon.com and BarnesandNoble.com, and can be ordered individually for $20 each (including shipping and handling) from www.survivorsmemoirs.com. All proceeds will support the publication of future volumes.

Albania saved its Jewry during the Holocaust

By OREN SHEFA
Special to the CJN

In the wake of the German occupation during World War II, Albania, the only European country with a Muslim majority, managed to do what no other European nation was willing to do: save the lives of every last Jewish citizen and refugee within its borders.

On Oct. 23 at Toronto's North York Civic Centre, the Albanian-Canadian Community Association, led by its president, Saimir A. Lolja, reached out to members of the Jewish community in an effort to foster strong relationships between the two groups by highlighting Albania's role as saviour during World War II.

This country, still attempting to piece itself together following 46 years of communist rule that ended in the early 1990s, has the distinction of being the only country in Europe to boast a greater number of Jews within its border following the Holocaust than it did before it.

"[Knowing] that Albania was a sanctuary for Jewish people escaping Nazi terror is [for Albanians] an emotion filled with admiration," Lolja said.

Albanians live by a very simple code of conduct called besa, which Lolja explained is the requirement of all Albanians to open the door to anyone in need.

Literally, besa means a solemn oath or vow. It is a moral promise to live honestly and justly, to sacrifice of oneself for what is right. It is a belief so ingrained in the culture that when thousands of Jews sought refuge in Albanian homes and farms during the war, the thought of turning them away never entered their collective consciousness.

In Canada and especially in metropolitan centres such as Toronto, the small Albanian community is growing and looking to establish strong ties among the plethora of ethnic groups in the city.

Reaching out to Toronto's thriving Jewish population was an opportunity for organizations to not only give thanks for Albanian protection during the Holocaust, but to officially welcome the burgeoning community into the fold of the multicultural city.

One of the highlights of the evening was a screening of a 1997 documentary called I Want to Remember, He Wants to Forget, which followed a father and son retracing their escape path from Skopje, Macedonia, to the Albanian village of Skoder during the height of the Holocaust.

The film helped to emphasize the mood of the evening, one of cross-culture co-operation and respect.

Arnold Friedman, one of the speakers for Toronto's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, moved the audience to rousing applause when he declared that among all the powerful and civilized super-nations of Europe that had the opportunity to do something about the anti-Semitic direction the continent was taking, it was "little Albania that stood up to the tyrants and saved the Jews."

"I am so proud," he said, "to be among you [Albanians], who are the only Europeans with clean hands."

Sauvage organized 'liberation reunion'

Last year, Sauvage organized a "liberation reunion" on the 60th anniversary of D-Day, and persuaded French President Jacques Chirac to address Le Chambon.

In 1982, Sauvage founded the Chambon Foundation, a non-profit educational foundation "committed to exploring and communicating the necessary and challenging lessons of hope intertwined with the Holocaust's unavoidable lessons of despair."

Organizers noted that this year marks the 25th anniversary of Holocaust Education Week, the world's largest such program. It runs to Nov. 9.

Israel launches reprisals after Hadera killings

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Three Palestinians, including the mastermind of the recent Hadera suicide bombing, were killed Sunday in a shootout with Israel Defence Forces troops in the West Bank town of Qabatiyah.

The army had entered the town south of Jenin to hunt down members of the Islamic Jihad cell responsible for the Hadera suicide bombing last week, and Palestinian sources said one of the men killed was Jihad Awidat, the Jihad operative who dispatched Hassan Abu Zaid to Hadera.

Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom had said last Friday that Israel would not be restrained in its hunt for Palestinian militants, signalling that last week's Gaza airstrike that killed two Islamic Jihad terrorists and three civilians would not be Israel's last reprisal for the Hadera bombing, which killed five people.

The air force's targeting of Islamic Jihad operative Shadi Mahaneh in Gaza, who the army said was involved in launching rockets at Israel, was part of a broad anti-terror offensive targeting Islamic Jihad.

And since the Hadera bombing, the IDF and Shin Bet have also been focusing their attentions on the Islamic Jihad network in Jenin and adjacent Qabatiyah that was behind the attack. Abu Zaid, the bomber, lived in Qabatiyah.

On Friday morning, Palestinians fired two Qassam rockets from the Gaza Strip, one of which landed in an open area north of Gaza. The Israel Air Force fired two missiles into the northern Gaza Strip and targeted two roads leading to the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahia. No casualties were reported in any of the incidents.

"The message cannot be one of silence and restraint after such a terrible attack," Shalom told Israel Radio when asked about a U.S. entreaty that Israel act cautiously. "The terror organizations must know that we will continue to hunt them everywhere, all the time."

Islamic Jihad, Hamas and the Fatah-affiliated Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades vowed revenge for the Thursday air strike that killed Mahaneh.

Hamas' pledge of revenge indicates that it plans to violate the "calm" it had agreed to maintain. The decision comes after four armed groups pressured Hamas to join them in responding to Israel's multi-pronged response to the suicide bombing in Hadera.

The Israel Defense Forces has also begun implementing a plan to sever the northern West Bank, where the bomber lived, from the rest of the territory. The IDF was erecting permanent barriers in certain areas, setting up checkpoints on the roads and forbidding private Palestinian vehicles from using roads in the area.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon announced he would not meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as long as the PA fails to act against the terrorist organizations.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who telephoned Abbas last Thursday, also urged him "to act against terrorist groups," U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit, in contrast, said Israel bore "the greater responsibility" for the escalation in the territories.

Palestinian eyewitnesses reported hearing a second explosion after the missiles hit on Thursday, and IDF sources said the army is investigating the possibility the car was carrying Qassam rockets that blew up when the missile landed.

If so, it's possible the explosion of these rockets is what actually killed bystanders, the sources said. But Palestinians attributed the second blast to the explosion of the car's gas tank.

According to the IDF, Mahaneh was a senior Islamic Jihad operative in northern Gaza who was directly responsible for crews that fired Qassams and mortar shells from Gaza into Israel. He was also involved in planning shooting and bombing attacks against IDF soldiers in Gaza before the disengagement. IDF sources said that throughout the period of the security lull, Mahaneh continued to prepare Qassams and mortars and trained people to use them.

Mahaneh was the second assassination Israel has carried out in Gaza since it left the territory. The first was on Sept. 25, when the IDF killed Mohammed Sheikh Khalil, also of Islamic Jihad.

In another response to the Hadera bombing, the IDF imposed a general closure on the territories last Thursday and shut down all the crossings between Israel and the territories. However, on-the-ground co-ordination with the PA continued, and Israel promised to make exceptions for humanitarian emergencies.

Throughout Thursday, the air force bombed Qassam launch zones in northern Gaza and access roads leading to these areas, to make it harder for terror groups to fire rockets into Israel. In addition, the IDF mustered forces on the border with Gaza, to be ready should the government decide on a ground operation there.

In the West Bank, the IDF conducted arrest operations throughout Thursday, nabbing some 20 wanted men, most from Islamic Jihad.

UN set to vote on global day to mark Holocaust

Ha'retz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The United Nations General Assembly was set to vote Monday on the establishment of an international Holocaust remembrance day.

The proposal, which was submitted by Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, enjoys a solid majority, with at least 100 out of 190 UN members promising to approve it.

The motion – which marks the first time Israel has submitted a resolution to the General Assembly – calls for Jan. 27, the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, to be recognized as an international day of Holocaust remembrance.

In recent years, a few European states have set an annual date on their calendar to commemorate the Holocaust. The proposal was submitted in co-operation with the United States, Russia, Australia and New Zealand, as well as members of the European Union.

As part of the proposal, all member states will be called upon to develop an educational curriculum meant to instill the memory of the Holocaust in future generations in order to prevent genocide from occurring again.

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan has expressed support for the measure.

The draft resolution reads, in part: "The Holocaust constituted a systematic and barbarous attempt to annihilate an entire people, in a manner and magnitude that have no parallel in human history. Six million Jews, a full third of the Jewish people, together with countless other minorities, were murdered. And yet, while the Holocaust was a unique tragedy for the Jewish people, its lessons are universal.

"The United Nations, an organization founded on the ashes of the Holocaust and committed to 'save succeeding generations from the scourge of war' and to uphold and protect the 'dignity and worth of human beings,' bears a special responsibility to ensure that the Holocaust and its lessons are never forgotten and that this tragedy will forever serve as a warning to all people of the dangers of hatred, bigotry, racism and prejudice."

Shalom was scheduled to attend the session, but instead decided to attend Tuesday's opening of the Knesset's winter session.

A number of foreign ministers, including those of Security Council members Britain, Russia and the United States, are expected to attend the session.

Security Council condemns Iranian genocide call

By ALUF BENN and SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United Nations Security Council unanimously condemned Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's calls last week for Israel's destruction, and ambassadors from the council's member states have privately urged Secretary General Kofi Annan to cancel an upcoming visit to Tehran.

"The members of the Security Council support the secretary general's statement of 27 October noting that, under the United Nations Charter, all members have undertaken to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State," Security Council President Mihnea Ioan Motoc of Romania said last Friday in a statement.

Meanwhile, tens of thousands of Iranians staged anti-Israel protests across the country last Friday as Ahmadinejad repeated his earlier call for Israel's destruction, Israel Radio reported.

Ahmadinejad appeared at a Tehran rally and took a walk with the crowd. He rejected the West's condemnation of his original comment that "Israel must be wiped off the map."

"My words were the Iranian nation's words. Westerners are free to comment, but their reactions are invalid," he told the official IRNA news agency.

State-run TV showed Ahmadinejad surrounded by protesters, many holding banners carrying anti-Israeli and pro-Palestinian slogans including "Death to Israel, death to America."

World leaders condemned the remarks, which Ahmadinejad initially made last Wednesday. He was repeating the words of the late Ayatollah Khomeini, founder of Iran's Islamic revolution.

Iran sought to smooth over the effects of Ahmadinejad's comments.

"Mr. Ahmadinejad did not have any intention to speak up in such sharp terms and enter into a conflict," the Iranian Embassy in Moscow said in a statement.

"It's absolutely clear that, in his remarks, [he] underlined the key position of Iran, based on the necessity to hold free elections on the occupied territories," the statement said.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki was less diplomatic.

"The comments expressed by the president is the declared and specific policy of the Islamic Republic of Iran," he told state-run TV last Thursday. "We don't recognize the Zionist regime and don't consider it legitimate."

He also said the massive demonstrations in Iran would show the Islamic world's anger over Israel's existence.

Iran's seven state-run TV stations devoted coverage Friday to programs condemning Israel and praising Palestinian resistance since 1948.

Hundreds of Indonesian Muslims also gathered in front of the U.S. embassy in Jakarta Friday to protest against Israel and the United States.

Meanwhile, Israel's Foreign Ministry moved forward with its diplomatic offensive against Iran, launched in response to Ahmadinejad 's statements.

Last Thursday, Israel called for Iran's expulsion from the United Nations.

In a letter to Motoc, Israel's ambassador to the UN, Danny Gillerman wrote that Ahmadinejad's comments require a strong and decisive response from the international community, Israel Radio reported. He said no country that calls for violence and destruction should be allowed membership in the UN.

At a meeting Thursday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov in Jerusalem, Sharon also said that a country that calls for the destruction of another people can't be a UN member. "Such a country that has nuclear weapons is a danger, not only to Israel and the Middle East, but also to Europe," the prime minister said.

Senior Israeli Foreign Ministry officials convened Thursday to decide on the best way to handle the issue. Some expressed reservations about the diplomatic offensive, saying it would be better for Israel to keep a low profile, but that position was rejected.

The Iranian foreign ministry called on its ambassadors in Europe to adopt countermeasures in response to their summoning by European foreign ministries. It called on the Iranian diplomats to present their "serious protest" against the European ignorance of "crimes committed by the Zionists and suppression of the Palestinian nation."

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Lavrov, meanwhile, said his government condemned the statements and called in Iran's ambassador to Moscow for clarification. He said the Russian ambassador to Tehran had been instructed to present an official condemnation.

Lavrov also met with Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres and said Moscow is opposed to Iran's attempts to develop nuclear weapons. He said there's no proof that Iran has nuclear weapons yet and that, according to Russia's information, it would take a long time before it did.

Therefore, Lavrov said, the wide-scale diplomatic campaign against Iran should continue, but care should be taken not to push Tehran to a point where it refuses to abide by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, like North Korea.

Meanwhile, in a rare rebuke of a UN member state, Annan reprimanded Ahmadinejad, expressing "dismay" over his comments in a statement released in a special bulletin by his spokesperson.

"Israel is a long-standing member of the United Nations with the same rights and obligations as every other member," Annan said, adding that the UN Charter is opposed to threats or the use of force against the territorial integrity and political independence of any state, he said.

Annan said he plans to visit Iran in "the next few weeks" and will put the Mideast peace process and the right of all states to live in peace and safety within secure borders on top of his agenda.

Annan's comments came amid widespread condemnation of Ahmadinejad's statements by European Union leaders and several European countries, as well as the United States, Canada, Australia and the Palestinian Authority.

"This is unacceptable to us," Erekat said. "We have recognized the state of Israel and we are pursuing a peace process with Israel, and... we do not accept the statements of the president of Iran. This is unacceptable."

EU leaders said no country that claimed to be a responsible member of the international community could make such a call.

"EU leaders... condemned in the strongest terms the comments in respect of the State of Israel attributed to President Ahmadinejad of Iran," EU leaders said in a statement issued at a one-day summit outside London.

"Calls for violence, and for the destruction of any state, are manifestly inconsistent with any claim to be a mature and responsible member of the international community," they said.

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said he condemned the Iranian statement "absolutely." Asked whether he believed Iran should be expelled from the UN, Barroso said: "I will not make any concrete proposal now."

"It is a completely unacceptable statement, of course," Barroso told the BBC. "We should respect borders and respect the integrity of Israel, and we want Israel to live in peace with its neighbours."

At the close of a European Union summit outside London on Thursday, Blair said he has "never come across a situation of the president of a country saying they want to ... wipe out another country... Their attitude towards Israel, their attitude towards terrorism, their attitude on the nuclear weapons issue, it isn't acceptable... Can you imagine a state like that with an attitude like that having a nuclear weapon?"

The British leader said the comments made him feel "revulsion."

White House spokesperson Scott McClellan said the incident "underscores the concerns we have about Iran's nuclear intentions."

"Of course, we are opposed to Iranian policies with regard to Israel, we are opposed with regard to the nuclear policy, with regard to their support of terror, with regard to their negative policies in Iraq," the Voice of America quoted the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmy Khalilzad, as saying.

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew said he wanted to "vigorously condemn the remarks made by Iran's president. We are in the 21st century. Canada will never accept such hatred, intolerance and anti-Semitism. Never."

Pettigrew added that Ahmadinejad's comments "are all the more troubling given Iran's nuclear ambitions and its refusal to co-operate fully with International Atomic Energy inspectors."

Besides the Palestinian Authority, other Arab governments kept quiet about Ahmadinejad's statements, but analysts said Tehran's Arab rivals may be quietly pleased to see the radical regime further isolated by its own extremism.

As Israel's diplomatic offensive continued, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom met with his French counterpart, Philippe Douste-Blazy in Paris and said that "the international community must prevent Iran from developing a nuclear bomb. Tehran says its nuclear program is purely to make power but we know what the Iranians' real intentions are."

"The Iranians are trying to develop a nuclear bomb in order to destroy the state of Israel," he told reporters after the meeting. "The time has come for the whole international community to be united in order to stop the Iranians."

Shalom said Iran is developing missiles with a 3,000-kilometre range that can reach Europe.

"Iran is a threat to the entire West. It already has missiles that can reach Israel," he said, adding that Tehran could have a nuclear bomb within six months.

Ahmadinejad's comments were "unacceptable and shocking," Douste-Blazy said, adding that "nobody has the right to call the State of Israel into question... We will not permit a nuclear Iran."

Israel Briefs

Foes help at sea

Syrian sailors rescued two Israelis whose boat sank off Cyprus. An Israeli drowned early on Oct. 23 when the catamaran he was on went down during a storm 5 miles away from the island. The other two Israelis aboard were hauled onto a passing Syrian ship and taken ashore. The survivors said they were well-treated by the Syrians, but they noted their boat flew a Canadian flag.

Hamas threatens kidnappings

Hamas vowed to continue abducting Israelis unless Palestinians jailed in Israel are freed. "If they are not released, kidnappings will increase. Who doesn't serve in the Israeli army? It's not something personal against this or that citizen. It's a national conflict," Mahmoud al-Zahar, leader of the Islamist terrorist group in Gaza, told Ha'aretz. A Hamas cell in the West Bank abducted and killed a Jerusalem man last month.

Jewish Agency aids Arab victims of terror

The Jewish Agency for Israel compensated Israeli Arab terror victims. The agency's chairman, Zeev Bielski, met last week with four families who lost relatives in a gun attack by an extremist Jew in the Arab town of Shfaram last August, giving each a cheque for $5,000 (US). It was the first time the Jewish Agency's Fund for the Victims of Terror has given compensation to Arabs.

Diamond dealer found dead

An Israeli businessman who went missing in Greece was murdered. The body of diamond dealer Shmuel Levy was discovered last week buried in a coastal town 30 miles from Athens, two weeks after he disappeared. Local police said four Greeks were under arrest on suspicion of abducting and killing Levy, 66, in a bid to steal his diamonds. Earlier assessments had been that Levy had been abducted by terrorists, as valuables were left behind in his rented apartment.

Abbas a 'one-man show'

Mahmoud Abbas is a "one-man show" who doesn't have the support of his people for peacemaking, Israel's defence minister said. Shaul Mofaz expressed his disappointment with the Palestinian leadership in an interview in Friday's Yediot Achronot newspaper. "[Abbas] is a one-man show," Mofaz said. "Behind him there is nothing, only emptiness. Governmental vacuum. In fact, there is no one to talk to." Mofaz expressed skepticism about achieving peace with the current Palestinian leadership. "We shall have to wait for the next generation," he said.

U.S., PA approve $2 million in road projects

The U.S. Agency for International Development and the Palestinian Authority have budgeted more than $2.24 million (US) for two roads, one in Jabalya, north of Gaza City, and one in Nuseirat, south of Gaza City, the U.S. State Department announced late last month. The money comes out of $50 million promised by U.S. President George W. Bush last spring and transferred to the Palestinian Authority in August. The U.S. agency must approve all expenditures. The U.S. State Department said the projects will create 30,000 work days and have a "positive impact" on the lives of 240,000 people. Another $250 million in U.S. money is in the pipeline for the Palestinians, aimed at smoothing governance after Israel's Gaza withdrawal.

The United States will not co-operate with a Palestinian government that includes people who advocate violence, President George W. Bush said. "If people get elected, they're going to use violence as a tool, there won't be our help," Bush said in an interview broadcast on Al-Arabiya, an Arabic-language satellite channel. "We just won't be involved. If people get elected who say, 'We want to advance peace and prosperity of the Palestinian people,' we'll be involved." The Bush administration has not backed Israeli demands that the Palestinian Authority ban Hamas and other terrorist groups from running in January legislative elections.

Five Israelis killed in Hadera bombing

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

HADERA, Israel — Surrounded by scattered apples and onions, the blue-and-white checkered blanket covered most of the body lying on the pavement. But it was not quite long enough to cover the body's feet.

The body belonged to one of the five victims murdered by a suicide bomber's explosives in the Hadera market last Wednesday – among them an Israeli Arab who taught Hebrew in nearby schools and a retired factory worker who was watching his friend's vegetable shop.

The bomber detonated himself on a street lined with towering eucalyptus trees in front of one of Hadera's oldest and most popular falafel stands, Falafel Barzilai. After the bombing, the awning over the stand was left burned to shreds, and parsley and green onions spilled out from upturned plastic crates.

"I saw an ear, a head, an hand and the body of an old woman in a dress, her face covered in blood," said Idan Akiva, 23, who raced to the scene from his home just two blocks away.

The bomber was identified as Hassan Abu Zayd, 20. He was reportedly freed from Israeli prison recently as part of a prisoner release because he had not killed any Israelis.

Near the scene of the bombing, locals gathered to get a closer look. Some were yeshiva students, others were parents with young children. Among them was Yigal Cohen, 43, whose father's vegetable stand stood next door to the falafel stand. His father had left shortly before the bombing to attend the memorial service for his own father at a nearby cemetery. The father's friend, Ya'akov Rahmani, 68, had agreed to watch the stand. He was killed in the blast.

Cohen stood behind the police tape and looked at the destruction, his eyes wide and unbelieving.

"I usually come to the market and see friends and family and people I have always known. I sometimes come to help my father out, and now I see all this," he said, his voice trailing off. "I grew up here. Everyone knows each other."

Mimi Shosha, a 56-year-old secretary, surveyed the smouldering market, shattered glass covering its sidewalks.

"We are scared to go out in a situation like this, but despite everything, we continue on," she said.

As she spoke, forensic workers in white jumpsuits picked through spilled vegetables and debris, collecting evidence. Swarms of police and border police blocked off the area. Slowly the bodies were placed in plastic white bags and quietly hoisted onto ambulances.

The five dead included Jamil Ka'adan, 48, of the Arab town of Baka Al-Gharbiye. The father of five taught Hebrew. He was at the market after deciding to go to the bank before heading home.

Sabiha Nisim, 66, from Moshav Ahitov, retired recently and was in the market to get a falafel when the bomb went off, killing her. Her husband, Aharon, reportedly hugged her body and would not leave the market until he was taken away by emergency workers. Nisim was the mother of six children and had eight grandchildren.

One of the dead in Hadera, a city with a large population of immigrants from the former Soviet Union, was Mikhail Koifman, 68, who immigrated to Israel in 1993 from Uzbekistan. He is survived by his wife, two children and grandchildren.

Pirhia Mahlouf, 53, a bank employee was also killed in the bombing. She had been in the market to shop for a meal for her two daughters who were about to begin college.

The Bride

adapted from the Gemara

This story takes place in Israel about 2,000 years ago. Rabbi Akiva was the greatest Torah scholar of his time.

Rabbi Akiva was sitting in his study, reading a parchment scroll by the light of a single candle, when a group of men entered unannounced. It was clear to him that they were not Jewish. Swathed in colorful robes embroidered with mystic symbols, the expressions on their pale faces were distant and unreadable. Their leader clutched a gnarled stick that lurched back and forth in his hand, seemingly of its own accord. They're stargazers, realized Rabbi Akiva. The same ones who accurately predicted the great fire that ravaged the marketplace three years ago. The same ones who foresaw the unexpected arrest and execution of Claudius the Sandalmaker. What could they want from me? Why are they here?

The leader approached Rabbi Akiva and opened his mouth. His words sounded like they were coming from far away. "Your daughter, Rabbi. Sarah. On the day she marries. She will die. It is foreseen." They turned to leave, and silently melted out the door. The single candle guttered and went out.

"Wait!" cried Rabbi Akiva, "wait!" But they ignored him and vanished into the darkness.

"Mazel Tov, Rabbi, why the long face? It's not every day you marry off a daughter!" But Akiva's mind was somewhere else. Even the bride noticed.

"Abba, I've never seen you like this before. What's the problem? Are you having second thoughts about the marriage? Because even though I think he's perfect, if you think there's a problem, it's not too late to call everything off..." Her eyes filled with tears.

"No, Sarah, I respect him as much as you do," replied her father. "So what's the problem? Nothing."

A dire sense of foreboding descended on Sarah. What could the problem be? And why isn't Abba telling me? She looked around nervously. The tables were draped in white lace, and the waiters were already putting out food for the wedding feast. Sarah adjusted the jeweled pin in her veil, and looked around again. At the entrance to the hall, across the room, stood a man who most definitely did not belong there. His clothing was torn and dirty, his hair wild and matted. "There's so much food here," he begged a passing waiter. "Could I please have something to eat?"

The man turned to a different waiter. "I haven't eaten in days. Please, could you..."

"Seventeen, eighteen. There are two extra chairs at this table," muttered the waiter to himself. "Any tables without chairs?" he yelled across the room. The poor man just stood there, ignored.

This is ridiculous, thought Sarah as she approached the first waiter. "Excuse me, that man —"

"Sorry, I know it's your special day and all that, but we're awfully busy making it special and we just don't have time to chat." And with that he rushed off to the next table.

Sarah looked at the poor man again. He really did look hungry. She walked to the head table and picked up her plate. It was piled high with gourmet meats and brightly coloured vegetables. I'll probably be able to get another plate later. Then again, with these waiters, perhaps not. But he needs it more than I do. And she carried her plate over to the beggar, who was so amazed at being served by the bride that he could only nod his head in gratitude.

"Sarah, there you are! We've been looking for you. Come out to the garden — we can't start the wedding ceremony without the bride!" And before she knew it, Sarah was standing by the wall of the courtyard garden next to her bridegroom, surrounded by both their families, the white chupah canopy spread over their heads.

"Ouch!"

Rabbi Akiva turned ashen. "What?"

"It's nothing, just that pretty pin in my veil — it keeps poking me. I have to take it out." And she looked around for a place to put it. There's a crack in the wall... perfect! Sarah stuck the diamond-covered pin in the wall, and in the ensuing whirlwind of celebration and dancing, she completely forgot about it.

It was only the next day that Sarah remembered the pin. She went back to the courtyard wall and tried to pull it out, but it was stuck. She gave a sharp yank, the pin popped out, and to her horror — attached to it was a venomous snake, skewered by the pin and quite dead.

All at once, Sarah remembered her father's uneasiness at the wedding and ran to his house. Rabbi Akiva stared at the dead adder, its fangs bared and poised to strike.

"Sarah, what did you do to deserve this salvation?"

Sarah thought for a moment. "Oh!" she gasped, and told him about giving the poor man her food.

Rabbi Akiva smiled in gratitude and wonder, as he exclaimed, "Tzedakah chatzil m'maves."

Baycrest, Mount Sinai join teleconferencing project

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Visionaries in the Middle East in search of a prescription for peace could gain a helpful dose of real-world advice from a unique health project launched recently in Toronto.

The agreement for the initiative, signed on Oct.24 at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, contains just about every aspect of what it will take to reach a viable Mideast peace, from genuine co-operation between Arabs and Jews to mutually sharing expertise, all while enriching the public's health.

Titled the "International Network of Knowledge through Electronic Learning," the endeavour partners Canadian healthcare professionals and academics with their colleagues in Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian territories and allows them to take part in video teleconferences.

Participants will share expertise on everything from diagnoses to treatments, all in real time.

"We now have a remarkable distance learning program at hand that will enable... Arab[s] and Israeli[s]... to share knowledge together under a Canadian umbrella and build trust and confidence in the health sector and beyond," said Dr. Arnold Noyek, director of the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health at Mount Sinai Hospital and chair of the Canadian International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), which are also partners in the project.

The other Canadian groups taking part are Baycrest and the University of Toronto. The Middle East partners are Tel Aviv University, the Jordan University of Science and Technology and Al Quds University in the West Bank.

Representatives from the Canadian partners were on hand at Baycrest to sign a memorandum of understanding that includes a $1 million donation from lawyer Peter A. Silverman.

"This program fulfills a long held dream of mine to help form an initiative that is truly global and has such groundbreaking potential," Silverman said.

The video teleconferences will mainly focus on professional development to address health issues such as geriatric psychiatry and behavioural neurology.

The intention is for the video teleconferences to spur a host of joint endeavours, such as team research, co-authored journal articles, professional training and fellowships.

"Video is a powerful tool for what we want to do," said Noyek. "There is real learning from this."

But participants expect that along with the academic dimensions will come steps toward peace.

"This leads to building relationships, mutual understanding, which feeds into trust and co-operation," said Dr. Harvey Skinner, chair of U of T's department of public health sciences.

"It's peace-building from the bottom up."

Skinner and Noyek said that in the end, patients gain the most.

For example, CISEPO initiatives have already led to treatments for patients, including the establishment of a treatment centre in Jordan that screened thousands of Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian newborns for hearing loss.

Other related joint projects have dealt with nutrition, youth issues and infectious diseases.

"The [goal] of our programs is to respond to real [patient] needs," Noyek said, adding that since patients benefit from the efforts of the project's partners, perhaps it will send a message to people that co-operation is in everyone's best interest.

"Healthcare is a common concern," said Baycrest Telehealth co-ordinator Tim Patterson.

Therapeutic riding instructor takes skills to Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If you have a lot of time, talk to Ami Bonder about his job on Kibbutz Grofit, about 30 miles north of Eilat.

Bonder, 22 is a certified therapeutic riding instructor for children with special needs, "and I could talk about the benefits forever," he said last month, just prior to making aliyah.

A graduate of Richmond Hill High School, Bonder went to University of Ottawa for one year before he decided to go on a birthright israel trip and stay on afterwards on a kibbutz.

His father Darryl, a veterinarian for horses, suggested he volunteer on Kibbutz Grofit. "[My father] did it when he was [a teenager], and we visited there when we were in Israel for my bar mitzvah trip. I remembered it, and thought it was a great idea."

He started off doing odd jobs, he said, and eventually started working with the kids. After returning to Canada for his sister's wedding, he enrolled at Equest in Dallas, Tex., a centre that provides equine assisted therapy and rehabilitation for children and adults with physical, developmental, emotional and learning disabilities.

"They told me at the kibbutz that if I became certified, they would hire me, and they already have kids waiting for me to begin."

Riding a horse is a great "equalizer," he says. "When kids sit on a horse, they're the same as or better than everyone else. Kids who are typically in a wheelchair spend their life looking up at people, but when they get up on a horse, people have to look up at them. It makes [the kids] feel good."

Children with social problems often develop a relationship with the horse, Bonder says. "Horses reflect in their attitude how we feel. A nervous person makes a horse nervous; they feed off our energy. It's a great way to teach kids. I have had therapeutic results myself from horses."

He also started playing the harmonica in time with the horse's rhythm, he says. "Sometimes that is what it takes to get someone's attention. We don't see results in everyone, but they do happen. The results are more common than people think."

Kibbutz Grofit offers a unique program, he says. "It is the only program that has kids from the kibbutz ride with kids from the city."

His father, who has worked with horse veterinarians and run conferences in Israel, "was so impressed with the program that he has decided to take on an active role. He is very proud of my decision."

His immediate family all live in Toronto, he says, "and it's difficult for them to see me go, but when I was volunteering on the kibbutz, they knew how happy I was. They said they could see me smiling over the phone."

He can't think of any other way to live, he says. "My life changed drastically in Israel. I went from being a typical 20-year-old Canadian boy, to someone who had [direction and purpose]. It was a change from day to night. Birthright was my transition stage."

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS

BEAUTY NEWS: Winter brings frosty hues and cool shades. Look forward to glitter with pale colours glistening all over, eyes and body shimmering, lips sparkling and cheeks glowing. The upcoming season is the time for having sexy and scintillating looks that are festive and fun!

Spamedica offers a new permanent injectable filler! The world of soft tissue fillers, plumping out those deep furrows, smile line grooves, droopy cheeks and deflated lips just got more exciting. Toronto and Los Angeles plastic surgeon Dr. Stephen Mulholland has been achieving wonderful soft tissue volume replacement in smile lines, frown lines, cheeks and chins, using BioAlcamid, a permanent, non-animal, gel like soft tissue filler.

"The BioAlcamid is an excellent soft tissue filler substance for many patients who are deficient of fat in their face or body contours. BioAlcamid is a soft, fat-like substance that is mobile and quite natural feeling and is well tolerated by the body. BioAlcamid allows me to create natural soft corrections for furrows and fat-deficient areas of the face that last for years. The product has also been an excellent, safe and long-term solution to correct the soft tissue body deficits that are quite common after liposuction," Mulholland says.

Chanel's Holiday Compact

Maurice Fiorio says, "Beautiful hair is always our goal. This season, we are focusing on energy in hair. Texture is back. Luxurious tone-on-tone colours provide depth and richness. Texture is all about the movement and flow of the natural state of hair. We are stepping away from flatirons and moving toward soft wave and curl. As the season changes from the humidity and moisture of summer to the drier, cooler winter air, hair will not get frizzy and flyaway. It is the perfect time to experiment with new techniques. As always, the key to surviving winter is moisture, moisture, moisture! Fiorio has a complete line of hair and body care to fill your needs from head to toe. The pure ingredients and essential oils provide rich, long-lasting nourishment throughout the cold months. Our winter must-have is humectant, which will tame your tresses in many ways. Use on wet hair to aid with shiny styles or dry to maintain smoothness.

CAROL AND STACEY'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: Christian Dior introduces a Soothing Toner for dry and sensitive skin. This alcohol-free lotion gently completes cleansing, leaving skin feeling supple and moisturized. Indulge yourself! Also from Dior, Cleansing Gelee for face, eyes and lips – a super-soft cleanser that removes makeup, cleanses all skin types and combines the gentleness of milk with the freshness of a toner.

Clinique CX introduces Soothing Moisturizer, specifically formulated to care for sensitive, stressed or delicate skin to provide immediate and ongoing relief from discomfort as it gently hydrates.

Vitalscience Corporation launches its new Dermaglow NuVectin Intense Moisture Therapy, specially formulated for dry skin. It provides intense, nourishing moisture for the face and neck, and helps maintain moisture, elasticity and firmness.

You can offer your loved ones an exciting Neostrata gift set that includes a Wrinkle Defence anti-wrinkle cream and eye contour anti-wrinkle cream-gel, and Advanced Dermo Systems at-home peel system and microdermabrasion system for an amazing value.

Ombra has developed a wide selection of aromatic herbal bath and body washes that affect one's mood positively and are highly recommended for relaxation and stress relief.

SPA: Biotherm unveils its new expert body care program, a 1-2-3 program that visibly improves skin quality and brings an immediate sensation of well-being. For clean, smooth skin that is perfectly hydrated, cleanse with the Refreshing Shower Gel, exfoliate with the Softening Exfoliator or Polishing Scrub, and moisturize with the Biosenses Nourishing Fortifying Body Balm.

Clinique CX introduces Stretch Mark Cream, an exciting new treatment designed to help reduce the appearance and discourage the occurrence of stretch marks while assisting the skin's natural repair process and helping to strengthen skin's elasticity.

Vichy Laboratories has developed Reti·C Concentrate for corrective night care – the latest intervention against skin aging and wrinkles, containing the optimum concentration of retinol and vitamin C.

HAIR: Goody's new offering is Dangerous Affair, a romantic hair accessory collection inspired by 18th-century European court fashion. Dangerous Affair blends luxurious and textured fabrics with elaborate rococo details into a collection that features bows, headbands, bobby slides, brooches, flower and feather pins and silk-covered ponytailers. Don't miss it!

FOUNDATION: Estée Lauder presents Individualist Natural Finish Makeup Foundation that instantly adapts to your unique complexion for a naturally flawless finish. Also from Estée Lauder is the Light Snow Shimmer Face Powder compact from the Holiday Pleasures collection, which embodies feminine luxury and festive shimmer.

Gwyneth Paltrow models the latest Estée Lauder line.

Lise Watier's Poudre Fantaisies has ultra-fine gold particles and chunkier glitter that, when blended together, add a regal aura to legs, shoulders and anywhere you need a little sparkle.

Giorgio Armani offers Midnight Shimmer Powder, a silky, pearlescent powder that clothes the bare face and body in a transparent veil gleaming with fine, iridescent sparkle that elegantly illuminates the skin.

BLUSH: Clarins has developed The Brush, a petite, portable makeup tool that is ideal for applying compact powders for a smooth, precise application and comes in an elegant case.

Clinique's Blushing Blush provides a soft, perfect glow, yet it defines cheekbones and sculpts the face, bringing out the inner beauty in all of us – you'll radiate with natural beauty.

Dermaglow: Specially formulated for dry skin.

EYES: Duo-Phase eye makeup remover by Christian Dior is a magical two-phase solution formulated for the particularly delicate eye area. It is gentle and effective, making eyes come clean almost before you can blink. Try it today!

A collector's item for anyone who loves makeup, the new Chanel Holiday Collection combines light and darker tones to create delicate contrasts. The extra-flat, black lacquered case opens to reveal eight little slots filled with colour. A makeup "tray" has four eyeshadows, two glosses and two cream lipsticks.

Achieve high-voltage colour with the new Pure Pops Crème EyeShadow from Estée Lauder, an ultra-creamy shadow that delivers colour and luminous sheen in one easy sweep.

Ready to delight with MAC's colours and deluxe packaging? MAC Delights has six shades for the eyes. Each selection comes in a faux-croc-patterned metallic compact with an oriental flower motif. Don't miss it!

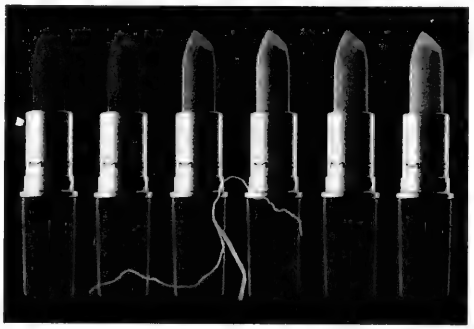
diffracted reflections of crystal, Giorgio Armani has created Midnight Eye Mania, four brilliant options to wear on their own or apply in layers, including three metallics in a frosted case.

Clinique introduces Colour Surge Eye Shadow Quads. Each mirrored compact holds four shades that range from natural to intense. All are flattering to wear, crease-resistant and non-fading.

This season indulge yourself with Bijoux Solo EyeShadow from Lise Watier, packaged in a transparent plexi compact embossed with a dazzling "W" in Swarovksi crystals. Inside you'll find the silkiest shadow that glides perfectly on the eyelid. To match these eyeshadows, try Lise Watier's Eye Glitter directly above lashes. Eye Glitter's coveted long-lasting, non-smudging, water-based formula has two new shades, Smokey Gold and Midnight Star.

Visage's new Candy Cane Shadow Palette, a limited edition product for the winter holidays, includes three sparking shades – icy white, frosted pink and rosy plum.

Lancôme has produced L'Extrême lengthening mascara that gives visible fibre extensions to the tips of natural lashes, creating a thick, soft and shiny effect.



New Cremestick Lipstick from MAC.

LIPS: For a richer, creamier lip, here's a dreamy combo from MAC: try new Cremestick Liner – lightweight and prevents feathering and bleeding – and Amplified Crème Lipstick. Creamily compatible in texture and comfort, apply together to achieve the perfect lips from the outside in.

Clinique presents Colour Surge Butter Shine Lipstick, a revolutionary formula that is taking lipstick to a whole new level. While quenching that desire for shine, this new lipstick offers a soft, buttery texture along with the comfort and grown-up glamour of lipstick that never goes out of style. Don't miss it!

Be sure to try Estée Lauder's Pure Color Crystal Gloss, an ultra-lustrous gloss that lavishes lips with daring sheer shine, and Pure Colour Crystal Lipstick in sheer, cool, crystalline shades that dazzle with brilliant dimensional effects.

In the exotic spirit of ornamentalism, try MAC Treasures, a trio of floral brocade jacquard bags. Inside each bag is an array of two lipsticks and one lipgloss.

Lise Watier introduces Gloss Gourmand Grenadine, loaded with intense shine particles to create a "mirror-like finish," and Crystal Drops Miel, which adds a layer of luminous vanilla to nude or delicately coloured lips. Also try Lise Watier's Virtual Lipliner that perfectly defines lips while providing exceptional, long-lasting coverage, but does not let lipsticks bleed and allows glosses to stay put – all with zero colour.

Midnight Lip Shimmer, the crystalline gloss combining the precision of a lipstick with a lustrous shine, has been reinvented in an ultra-sophisticated, evening version by Giorgio Armani. Packaged in shiny black lacquer and equipped with an applicator to guarantee perfectly shaped definition, Midnight Lip Shimmer is more iridescent than ever.

FRAGRANCE: Puma Red fragrance, created by Givaudan, has a floral, fruity, amber scent that is hip and stylish.

Donna Karan wants to give the gift of inspiration with the Message of Hope program that is centred on a special edition of the DKNY Be Delicious women's and men's fragrance bottles inscribed with Donna's heartfelt message. This initiative benefits UNICEF, as a portion of the proceeds will be donated.

Introducing Live Jennifer Lopez, an upbeat fruity-floral fragrance with addictive appeal that is as sexy and alive as a body moving to music.

Sophisticated romance of island lifestyle is captured in the first fragrance collection from Tommy Bahama, inspired by warm westerly breezes and the rustling of palm fronds, including an eau de cologne for men that is vibrant and exudes luxurious warmth and sophistication, and an eau de parfum for women that is a modern floral fragrance with a citrus burst at the top.

For one last time before it bids farewell for good, count on Lise Watier's So Chic! fragrance to spritz your end-of-year parties! Luxurious like cashmere, soft and seductive, it's really so very chic to wear this limited-edition fragrance.

Estée Lauder is pleased to present Gwyneth Paltrow in the new Estée Lauder Pleasures print and television ad to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the iconic global fragrance.

MEN: Puma White fragrance, created by Robertet, has a fresh, fruity, woody scent encased in the usual object that is a water bottle.

Krikorian is pleased to introduce the signature fragrance, Alessandro dell'Acqua Man, a fragrance with the freshness of a sea breeze, with sparkling head notes of grapefruit, bergamot, lemon, mandarin, orange blossom and pineapple.

Exhibit a fundraiser to restore Jewish Shanghai

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ian Leventhal with one of his paintings. [Ron Csillag photo]

Even in his most artistic flights of fancy, Ian Leventhal never imagined that one day he would play such an important role in reclaiming modern Jewish history.

"I'm just an artist," shrugs and smiles the boyish-looking Leventhal, an accomplished 54-year-old painter. "Who knew?"

He certainly never thought he'd be heading an international effort to restore, preserve and help chronicle the legacy of the Jews of Shanghai, the teeming Chinese port city where some 20,000 Austrian, German and Czech Jewish refugees of the Nazi Holocaust not only found a haven, but thrived amid their sports clubs, cabarets, theatres and cafés.

Leventhal's current exhibit, "Journey of Hope," is an outgrowth – almost a culmination – of his successful 2002 show in Toronto, "Gift of Friendship," an art exhibition on the theme of Sino-Jewish ties that had grown out of his visit the year before to Shanghai's historic Hongkou district, site of the Jewish ghetto during World War II, and its historic Ohel Moishe synagogue.

"I was blown away," he recalls of his sightseeing trip. "I couldn't believe all that Jewish heritage – in China, of all places. It was like stepping back in time."

Even in a cramped ghetto under Japanese occupation, Jews created a vibrant community, with schools and fraternal groups and a throbbing cultural life.

The 2002 show brought together 33 Chinese and Jewish artists in Toronto and was conceived as "a gift from the Canadian Jewish and Chinese communities to commemorate the safe haven Shanghai offered to the Jews during the war years."

The next step was living up to the show's name, and gifting it to Shanghai. Leventhal turned to an old friend, designer Tom Rado, and in October, 2002, "Gift of Friendship" opened in a specially renovated building in the old synagogue's courtyard that was once used as a matzah factory.

The show made such a splash that during a working luncheon, the deputy mayor of the Hongkou district asked the Canadians whether they would like to get involved with ambitious redevelopment plans for the area.

It was an offer Leventhal and Rado could not turn down. They formed a partnership, Living Bridge International Inc., which was awarded an exclusive two-year contract as sole developer of the quarter's restoration.

Over the past three years, Leventhal has travelled to Shanghai 14 times. "The Chinese are very interested in bringing a renewed Jewish cultural presence to Shanghai," he said.

He doesn't discount that Beijing is also interested in buffing the country's image for the 2008 summer Olympics.

"Journey of Hope" is part fundraiser and part art exhibit. It showcases original and highly evocative black-and-white photographs of the wartime Jewish ghetto, historical artifacts and memorabilia, and Leventhal's own acrylic-and-collage works.

Over the next two years, it will travel to Montreal, New York, Washington, Miami, Chicago and Salt Lake City.

But mainly, the show seeks to defray the massive costs of restoring the old Jewish quarter, estimated at $700 million. "It will be phased in over a decade or so," Leventhal explains.

Last year, Clifford Korman, the co-founding partner of the Toronto firm of Kirkor Architects & Planners, was tapped to create a master plan for redeveloping Shanghai's old Jewish ghetto.

As Leventhal explains, the plan calls for the restoration of at least 50 decaying buildings within a congested seven-block radius of the Ohel Moishe synagogue. To show it was serious, the local government earlier this year declared the former Jewish ghetto a protected heritage site, one of only 12 areas of a city of 18 million people to be so honoured.

"We're looking at a gentrified, upscale, mixed-use neighbourhood," he says. "Most of these buildings are unsafe and unhygienic. Something had to be done anyway."

Their current residents will be relocated to new apartments, he adds.

Money will go toward collecting and preserving Shanghai's 1,500-year-old Jewish heritage. Plans call for a state-of-the-art museum and cultural complex and, of course, the restoration of the Ohel Moishe shul, built by Russian settlers in 1927 and now called the Jewish Refugee Memorial Hall.

Also slated for construction are two commercial towers, three high-rise condominiums, a hotel and shops.

The governments of Canada and Israel are not contributing financially, while the Chinese are providing only tax rebates and other concessions. Funds will have to be raised privately.

Sponsored by ORT Toronto, "Journey of Hope" continues to Nov. 7 at the Blue Dot Gallery in the Distillery District, 55 Mill St., Building 147, suite 101. Call 416-487-1500.

Names in the News: Christie's in New York is set to auction 15 outstanding Hebrew manuscripts from the collection of Salman Schocken (1877-1959), the famed German-Jewish businessman, publisher, collector and philanthropist. The auction date is Nov. 15.

As a retailer, Schocken built up profitable department store chains in Germany and commissioned architect Erich Mendelsohn to produce some of Germany's finest modernist architecture. He left Germany in the 1930s. As a publisher, he gave the world Franz Kafka, championed the work of kabbalistic scholar Gershon Scholem, became the first publisher of S.Y. Agnon, and introduced a vast amount of other Jewish writing to a large public.

An avid collector of Hebrew manuscripts, books and Judaica, he founded the Schocken Institute of Jewish Research in Jerusalem, which today holds his vast private library and is operated by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. Much of his most precious literary property is still privately held, and has been auctioned off in parcels.

He is the subject of a recent biography, The Patron, by Anthony David (Henry Holt).

Phenomenon of suicide bombing intrigued Israeli-Arab director

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Arab filmmaker Hany Abu-Assad was intrigued by the topic. "Like anyone else, I was curious," he said in an interview. "It's a big story."

Abu-Assad was talking about the phenomenon of the Palestinian suicide bomber, who has wreaked death and destruction on Israel since 1994.

His latest film, Paradise Now, which was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival and opens in local theatres on Nov. 11, concerns two Palestinians who sneak into Israel to detonate a bomb in Tel Aviv.

Before co-writing the script in collaboration with Dutch co-producer Bero Beyer, he studied the interrogation transcripts of bombers who had failed to carry out their missions, talked to people who had known them and read official Israeli reports.

What he learned was that none of their stories was identical. "There is not one type of person who becomes a suicide bomber," said Abu-Assad, comparing them to the biblical figure Samson. "There is not one face. They come from different backgrounds. But they all want to fight Israel's occupation. They want to change the situation. They do not want to feel weak and impotent."

Abu-Assad, who was born and raised in lower Nazareth, made Paradise Now in association with Dutch, German, Israeli and French associates. His Israeli colleague, Amir Harel, was the producer of Walk on Water and Yossi and Jagger, which impressed critics in Israel.

Having assembled an international crew, Abu-Assad brought them to Nablus, one of the largest towns in the West Bank and a hotbed of Palestinian nationalism. "It was very hard filming in Nablus, which is under siege and curfew by the Israeli army," he said. "We faced a lot of troubles."

Many Palestinians were suspicious of Abu-Assad's motives. "Some Palestinians thought I was against them."

And on the day his location manager was kidnapped, a missile from an Israeli helicopter gunship struck a car near the set. At this point, gunmen ordered them to leave Nablus. "This was the last straw for six of our European crew members," he said. "They left. I don't blame them. Life is more important than a film."

Worried about his abducted location manager, he contacted the then president of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat, and asked him to intervene. Within two hours, the man was released. But Abu-Assad was still concerned about the wisdom of remaining in Nablus, where much of Paradise Now unfolds. Several days later, a land mine exploded 300 metres from the set, and for Abu-Assad, this was the turning point.

"I wanted to continue filming in Nablus for authenticity and continuity, but I had no choice but to leave. I decided to move the set to Nazareth."

As a result of his horrible experiences in Nablus, Abu-Assad, whose previous films Nazareth 2000 and Rana's Wedding touch on the Arab-Israeli conflict, has vowed never to make another film in a Palestinian town under Israeli occupation.

Abu-Assad, 43, has definite views about suicide attacks. "As a non-violent person, I'm against them. It's better not to use violence. From the military point of view, suicide bombing is inefficient. You're killing your best soldiers."

Hany Abu-Assad

He holds Israel responsible for the bombings. "We've been made to use it by Israel, which is oppressing the Palestinians, and in the best case scenario, discriminating against them. This is a very humiliating situation, and not every Palestinian can accept it."

In his view, Israel and the Palestinians are both entitled to statehood, either through a two-state solution or in one binational state.

"What's most important is that Israelis and Palestinians should share everything equally. When this happens, it won't matter what kind of a state there is. Palestine is our land, not only Israel's. We should share it equally."

Yet Abu-Assad accepts the necessity of a Jewish state. "We know the Holocaust was a big crime. We are ready to forgive Israel for our suffering. The Israelis are good partners. They bring money and knowledge."

He said that Israelis should not fear Palestinians, whose outlook has been disfigured by fear and anger.

In principle, Palestinian refugees have a right to return to their former homes in Israel, he noted. But in practice, they should be compensated for their losses.

Abu-Assad left Israel in 1981 to study aircraft engineering in Holland, where he has lived since then. He said he emigrated because Israeli Arabs do not have access to the same educational and occupational possibilities as Jews. "As a young man, you seek out opportunities, and I wanted to discover the world."

He plans to co-direct his next film, a comedy about the human condition, with an Israeli. "If we can do this, we can share the land."

A review of Paradise Now will appear next week.

Documentary celebrates rescue of Danish Jews in 1943

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The rescue of Danish Jews during World War II was a shining moment of humanity in the annals of the Holocaust.

Millions of European Jews were murdered in ghettos, killing fields and Nazi death camps, but in Denmark (and Bulgaria) the mould was broken.

On Sunday, Nov. 6 at 4 p.m. and again at 7 p.m. at the Miles Nadal JCC, the Toronto Jewish Film Society will screen The Danish Solution, a 58-minute documentary on the subject by Karen Cantor and Camilla Kjaerulff.

Denmark signed a non-aggression pact with Germany and remained neutral when World War II broke out. But on April 9, 1940, the German army stormed into Denmark.

Denmark, nevertheless, co-operated with the invaders, and its government continued to function. Indeed, as far as Hitler was concerned, Denmark was a model protectorate, supplying Germany with 10 per cent of its agricultural needs.

Denmark, however, disappointed the Germans by treating its Jewish citizens with respect. Danish Jews, some of whom had settled in the country in the early 20th century as immigrants from eastern Europe, were not required to wear the dreaded yellow star.

When Denmark's attitude to Germany changed from compliance to defiance in 1943, prompting Germany to declare a state of emergency, the Jews suddenly found themselves in real danger.

Werner Best, the German representative in Denmark, let it be known that Jews would be rounded up starting on Oct. 1, 1943.

In the face of this situation, Jews prepared for the worst, while Christian pastors concealed Torah scrolls taken from Copenhagen's main synagogue.

More than 200 Jews from a Jewish seniors home were summarily arrested and deported, but the rest of the Jewish community got away in the nick of time, transported to neighbouring Sweden by Danish fishermen in their boats. Jews paid for their passage, but the courage of the fishermen cannot be doubted.

According to the filmmakers, Niels Bohr, the famous scientist of Jewish descent, persuaded Sweden to admit the Jewish refugees. As a result of Denmark's resolution and Sweden's hospitality, 95 per cent of Danish Jewry survived. After the war, they returned to Denmark to reclaim their properties.

The Danish Solution, narrated by Garrison Keillor, may restore your faith in humanity.

Medieval epidemic depopulated the world and touched off pogroms

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The world's greatest natural disaster, the southeast Asian tsunami of December 2004 notwithstanding, ravaged the globe more than 600 years ago.

Apocalyptic in scale, the Black Death swept into Europe from Asia, killing an estimated 200 million people – a demographic catastrophe of still unprecedented proportions – and causing unspeakable emotional distress.

From China in the east to Greenland in the west, from Siberia in the north to India in the south, the plague blighted lives everywhere. In many places, it claimed one-third of the population, and in some regions, 60 per cent.

"For a brief moment in the 14th century, the words of Genesis 7 – "All flesh died that moved upon the earth" – seemed about to be realized," John Kelly writes in The Great Mortality: An Intimate History of the Black Death, the Most Devastating Plague of All Time (HarperCollins), a substantive, sweeping work.

We know from contemporary accounts that the plague arrived in Europe in the autumn of 1347. By the winter of 1349, one of its great cities, London, was grimly struggling with it.

Thomas Vincent, an observer, wrote: "Now, there is a dismal solitude. Shops are shut... people rare, very few walk about... and there is a deep silence in almost every place. If any voice can be heard, it is the groans of the dying..."

The Great Mortality, as it was commonly known, had a profound impact on European Jews, touching off one of the most violent outbursts of anti-Semitism in the Middle Ages.

Prefiguring the 20th century paranoia associated with The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the plague came to be widely regarded as an international Jewish conspiracy aimed at achieving global domination, Kelly observes.

He claims that the Swiss town of Chillon played an important role in fomenting rumours that the Black Death was a malicious Jewish plot. Confessions were extracted from local Jews that a certain sinister Rabbi Jacob and a network of agents had delivered packets of poison to Jews throughout Europe.

During the resultant hysteria, a large but unknown number of Jews were murdered. Some were burned at the stake, while others were marched into public bonfires. Still others were barbecued on grills, bludgeoned to death and stuffed into empty wine caskets and rolled into rivers. In several localities, the killings were proceeded by show trials.

According to Kelly, the first pogrom linked to the Black Death took place on April 13, 1348 in Toulon, France, when dozens of Jews were dragged from their homes, jeered, taunted, kicked and wantonly murdered. Within days, the violence spread to neighbouring villages.

By the autumn of 1348, the pogroms reached Solden, Stuttgart, Reutlingen and Lindau in Germany.

In a few cases, Jews were offered the option of conversion, but most chose death, astounding one chronicler:

"The insane constancy shown by [the Jews]... was amazing. "Mothers would throw their children into the flames rather than risk them being baptized and then would hurl themselves into the fire..."

Pope Clement VI, denouncing the persecution of Jews, declared, "Recently, it has been brought to our attention by public fame – or, more accurately, infamy – that numerous Christians are blaming the plague... on poisonings carried out by the Jews at the instigation of the devil, and that out of hotheadedness they have impiously slain many Jews, making no exception for age and sex."

Influenced, perhaps, by his statement, a few municipal leaders defended their Jewish communities.

In the southern French port of Marseilles, a bastion of tolerance, the Jewish community experienced no harassment or attacks. As a result, Marseilles became a haven for Jews fleeing persecution elsewhere.

He did not want angry mobs throwing Jews down wells, but neither did he want to appear unsympathetic to popular feelings. Resolving his dilemma with a traditional bureaucratic ploy, he ordered an investigation.

To Jews, the end of the plague was an occasion of joy and relief. To the population at large, it was an opportunity to celebrate. As Kelly puts it: "Survivors drank intoxicatingly, fornicated wildly, spent lavishly, ate gluttonously, dressed extravagantly."

Yet no amount of celebration could mask the dire consequences of the Black Death. Europe lost anywhere from one-third to three-quarters of its population. But the dramatic upsurge in the birthrate after the Black Death subsided altered the demographic balance.

Like many of his contemporaries, the French monk, Jean de Venette, was astonished at the number of pregnant women on the streets: "Everywhere women conceived more readily than usual. None proved barren. On the contrary, there were pregnant women wherever you looked. Several gave birth to twins, and some to living triplets."

By the 1380s, Kelly notes, Europe had replaced its cataclysmic losses.

Yet chronic labour shortages continued to affect Europe for decades. Europe, in, 1450, produced fewer goods than it had in 1300.

The principal industry of the Middle Ages, the Flemish-dominated cloth industry, was particularly hard hit because its prosperity was utterly dependent on a mass market.

The Black Death, though, ushered in major positive changes.

The hospital was revolutionized. The chief function of the pre-plague hospital was to isolate the sick so that they would not infect others. In the wake of the plague, hospitals attempted to cure the sick, though, as Kelly points out, patients fortunate enough to emerge from a hospital in sound health in the late Middle Ages probably owed more to good genes and good luck than to medical treatment.

The Black Death also led to an upgrading of the level of public health and prompted the founding of numerous universities in towns and cities ranging from Cambridge to Cracow.

Kelly, in The Great Mortality, gives a reader a cogent overview of a wrathful pestilence that almost destroyed civilization as we know it.

In an epoch when researchers are coping with such calamities as AIDS and, now, the bird-flu virus, his book is extremely topical.

The up-side of being downsized

By SHERI SHEFA

Working out of a bedroom, with nothing but a borrowed typewriter and a lot of ambition, Lisa Olfman and Joy Rosen built a multimillion-dollar entertainment company and thrust themselves to the forefront of the entrepreneurial world.

When they lost their jobs at another entertainment company, they knew that if they were going to be successful, they would have to do it on their own terms, regardless of the challenge.

"So Joy and I had an option. Do we go out and find other jobs or do we look to each other and look to the strengths that developed by working for other companies? We decided to go with the latter," said Olfman, the president and co-founder of Portfolio Entertainment Inc.

Olfman explained that within two years, they were able to turn a $15,000 new-ventures loan from Royal Bank in 1991 into the multimillion-dollar business that produces shows, as well as distributes products to international TV networks.

"We moved into Lisa's house with the furniture that we took from the last company. But we had never been in business on our own," Rosen said.

"It took two years of basically trying to bring business to us, get a series off the ground and into production, cobble enough programs together to sell to other sale agents and producers."

Not until Olfman and Rosen completed and sold their first series, Groundling Marsh, did they begin to reap financial benefits.

"We didn't get paid at all, we didn't have any employees and the rent in Lisa's house was pretty good in that she didn't charge us. If we bought a pound of coffee a week that was OK," Rosen said with a laugh.

Both Olfman and Rosen, who were co-named the Rotman School of Business' Canadian Woman Entrepreneur of the Year in 2003, attribute their success to blind ambition, as well as a wonderful working relationship.

"If you want us to be successful, just tell us we can't do something. That's fighting words for us. It's amazing that I still respond to that after all these years," Rosen said.

"I think that it happens that we're also very good friends. I think it's important when you're setting up with a partner that you have a very clear set of goals and values and vision.

"It's very rare where we'll have a meeting with someone and they'll present something where we disagree. It's been 14 years and we are still on the same path," she added.

Rosen said that they can't take all the credit for the concepts of the shows they produce. They get help from from the creative minds of many people – mostly freelancers – who are involved in their projects.

"It's a very collaborative process. It's not like it is anybody's one idea. Usually someone will come up with a seed of an idea and someone will add to it. Before you know it we're there," she said.

Many of the concepts for their productions come from the news. For instance, Stolen Miracles, a Christmas movie for which they received two Gemini nominations three years ago, was based on a true Canadian story about a woman who kidnapped a newborn baby from a maternity ward of a hospital.

Carl2 (Carl Squared), Portfolio Entertainment's newest animated series about a 14-year-old boy who gets a clone, was an idea that came off the newspaper pages as well.

"When we were looking at the news at that time, cloning was and is still in the forefront of everybody's mind. We tried to think, what would a 14-year-old think of cloning?

"Some of the feedback from our early focus testing showed that most kids would love to have a double, to be able to take care of the chores, the homework and the nasty things, so they could go out and party or just do nothing," Olfman said.

When he sees an online ad inviting him to order his own clone, he decides this could be the answer to his prayers.

"But essentially," added Rosen, "the clone, who is a perfect DNA replica of him, except for a little bit of dog DNA, has none of Carl's attitudes, or his experiences. It's not exactly like this perfect situation that Carl and his teenage take-the-easy-route mind had imagined."

Aside from solid concepts complemented by great writing, Olfman said that the reason their productions enjoy such success is because the shows offer positive and uplifting messages.

"We like to champion heroes who solve their own problems," Olfman said.

"And that runs through everything we do. There doesn't seem to be a lot of anger or harshness in our messages," she added.

More important to the success of a series or a drama is that they produce something they both really believe in.

"We have a hard time getting behind a project we aren't passionate about. It's very important that when we pick a project, we really love it because it takes a ton of work to get it off the page and on to the screen. You have to really believe in it," Rosen said.

Because their themes are universal, Olfman and Rosen are able to sell their shows to some of the world's top TV stations.

"We do a lot of business in Israel selling our shows. Most of our shows air on Israeli networks," said Olfman, who added that they managed to sell Carl2 to TV network Nickelodeon in Israel.

"One of the most exciting things is when you get to listen to your programs in different languages, in Icelandic or Japanese. It's wonderful."

Even though they are still celebrating the launch of Carl2, Olfman and Rosen are keeping busy with another project that is part of both their lives.

Portfolio is currently producing a one-hour Jewish holiday special for Teletoon, the cartoon network, which they expect to have ready in time for Chanukah 2006.

"It's going to be an animated movie based on a book called Hershel and the Hanukkah Goblins by Eric Kimmel, which is a book that Lisa and I loved to read to our kids when they were younger," Rosen said.

"We're very excited about this. Lisa and I always loved the book and we love to tell kids' stories and we also feel committed to Jewish stories and Jewish themes and this book really encapsulates so many Jewish themes.

"It's set in a shtetl and it's about people that always had very little but used brains over brawn and made positive out of negative situations. Those themes really resonated with us," Rosen said.

Oil, water may mix for Israel, Turkey

By YIGAL SCHLEIFER
JTA

ISTANBUL — A recent visit to Turkey by Israel's infrastructure minister has given a renewed push to several projects that Israeli officials believe could have an important regional impact.

The primary reason for Benjamin Ben-Eliezer's visit was to sign a $360 million deal for a Turkish company to build a power plant in Israel. But the minister also used the visit to discuss the possibility of co-operation on a number of far-reaching energy and water projects.

"These are strategic projects at a very high level," Pinchas Avivi, Israel's ambassador to Turkey, said.

"Now we are entering into a phase of taking it from a nice idea to something that can be put into effect."

One proposed plan is the construction of a pipeline to bring water from Turkey to Israel. Israel last year signed a 20-year deal to import drinking water from a plant on Turkey's Manavgat River.

The original idea was to ship the water to Israel using large tankers, but that proved prohibitively expensive. Instead, Israeli officials are suggesting a pipeline of plastic tubing that would be partially submerged in the Mediterranean Sea. Turkey currently is building a similar pipeline to bring water from its southern mainland to northern Cyprus.

Israeli officials have said the pipeline could be extended to water-poor Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, giving the project a role in improving regional stability and possibly attracting foreign aid for its construction.

Another idea that was discussed, according to Israeli officials, is a proposal to use Israel as a transit point for oil arriving in Turkey via the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan, or BTC, pipeline. That's a $4 billion, 1,093-mile project that will bring Caspian Sea oil and natural gas to Turkey's Mediterranean coast from Azerbaijan via Georgia.

The BTC ends at the Turkish port of Ceyhan, but attention now is being turned to how the pipeline could benefit Israel, both as a source of energy supplies and by creating an opportunity for Israel to become a player in getting BTC oil to thirsty markets in Asia.

Israel's location and small size may turn out to be a strategic advantage. Since the largest oil tankers can't sail through the Suez Canal, oil pumped at Ceyhan and headed to Asia would have to make a lengthy trip around Africa. Pumping is expected to begin later this year.

One alternative under discussion is to transport the oil across Israel from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, where it would be loaded onto tankers heading for Asia.

"This definitely will create more opportunities," said Brenda Shaffer, a professor of Asian studies and political science at Haifa University. "There's more oil flowing into the Mediterranean only a day's boat ride from here. There's growing demand in Asia. If Israel is clever about it, it could market this not only commercially but also politically in a way that could improve regional security and stability."

For Turkey, which has few energy supplies of its own, the pipeline is the first step in its effort to become a major energy player, not as a producer but as a transit point. As countries look to diversify their energy sources, Turkey hopes to establish itself as a kind of energy supermarket, betting that controlling oil and gas routes will turn out to be as strategically valuable as producing the stuff.

"Geographically Turkey is endowed with advantages, so we would like to use those advantages to give Turkey a role as a supplier of energy resources that are located in the east and move those energy resources to the markets. It gives Turkey relevance," said a senior Turkish Foreign Ministry official involved in energy issues.

Israel's 158-mile Eilat-Ashkelon Pipeline, or EAP, could be used to transport the oil from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. Built in 1968, the pipeline originally was designed to ferry oil from the shah's Iran in the opposite direction, from east to west.

The BTC "builds a strategic alliance that is good for Israel. But now Israel has to complete the task, to use the Eilat-Ashkelon pipeline to ship oil to the Red Sea, and from there to the ultimate consumers in the Far East, including Japan," said Ephraim Sneh, a Labor Party legislator and former Israeli transportation minister.

But Barry Swersky, the Israel-based co-chairman of the oil company Big Sky Canada, which works in Central Asia, said questions remain about whether the shipping and oil worlds would accept Israel as a significant transit point for crude oil.

"Will ships be blacklisted? Will ship owners perceive that they will be blacklisted?" he asked.

Swersky also pointed out that work is being done on the Suez Canal to allow it to accommodate larger tankers, which could take away the EAP's competitive edge.

Egypt also operates the Sumed pipeline, a Suez Canal bypass that takes mostly Persian Gulf oil to the Mediterranean. The EAP's edge would be further eroded if Egypt reverses the flow on the Sumed.

More significant, Swersky said, is the question of how increased oil-tanker traffic would impact the environmentally sensitive Gulf of Aqaba.

"I'm not sure if there's serious thinking about up and turning a holiday resort into a serious oil port," he said. "There should be a serious examination while there is time."

Despite the absence of any announced deals, the company that runs the EAP recently made a significant upgrade on the pipeline that allows for the flow to be reversed, making it possible to pump oil from Ashkelon to Eilat.

"Meanwhile, India's minister of petroleum and natural gas, Mani Shankar Aiyar, recently suggested that Azeri oil could be delivered to his country via Israel.

Ambassador: recognize rhetoric, nuclear link

"That kind of lack of respect, intolerance, anti-Semitism… this is the 21st century and that statement is just out of an era that is long past and never should have occurred."

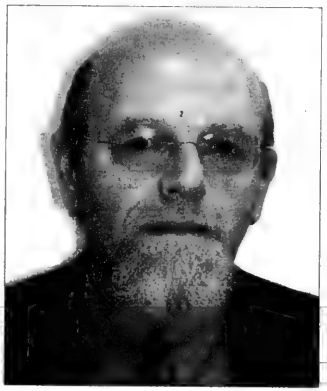
"The comments are all the more troubling given Iran's nuclear ambitions and its refusal to co-operate fully with International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors," Pettigrew stated in a news release. "This refusal underlines the need for all countries to stand together to ensure that Iran is prevented from developing nuclear weaponry. In fact, during her recent visit to Ottawa, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and I discussed how to address nuclear proliferation in Iran, including the possibility that the UN Security Council may have to send a strong message."

Opposition leader Stephen Harper called Ahmadinejad's comments "completely unacceptable. The promulgation of this kind of hate-filled ideology by a world leader is a threat to international peace and the collective legal basis of the UN. This follows the Iranian government's failure to co-operate with the UN on nuclear proliferation issues and the murder of Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi. Canada's voice on these issues must be heard at the UN, bringing to bear our nation's full influence to oppose these hate ideologies, weapons proliferation and state torture."

New Democrat MP Pat Martin, a member of the 56-member parliamentary friendship group, said he would "urge our party, without delay, to endorse and take part in the [all-party] resolution."

The flurry of political and diplomatic activity was prompted by provocative statement by Ahmadinejad at a conference in Tehran called "The World Without Zionism."

"[Those who recognize Israel] will be engulfed by the fiery rage of their own people," he said. "Israel must be wiped off the map." He also said, "There is no doubt that the new wave of [attacks] in Palestine will wipe off this stigma [Israel] from the face of the Islamic world."



Alan Baker

Ahmadinejad's remarks were widely criticized around the world, but Canada was among the first to come out strongly against them, said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel. He applauded the "very strong showing by the prime minister and the foreign minister on the issue."

Particularly significant was the "linkage between this rhetorical threat and the real threat posed by Iran to the international community."

Fogel said Canada must use its international influence to convince other states of the linkage, so "they show no weakness or lack of resolve in ensuring that Iran does not press on with its nuclear program and other countries not facilitate Iran's nuclear ambitions."

Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, said "the fact the foreign minister and the prime minister came out in such a firm manner and so quickly says something about Canada's intent to confront Iran and any such statement that calls for rubbing out a whole country."

He said it was "vitally important" that Canada recognized the link between the Iranian president's rhetoric and the country's nuclear program and he said he hopes Canada will take a leadership role on the issue at the UN.

The president's aggressive statement "scotches the myth that Iran is developing a nuclear program for peaceful purposes," he added.

In Jerusalem, spokespersons for the Simon Wiesenthal Center urged the United Nations to "act immediately to censure Tehran's tyrannical regime for its call to genocide."

Rabbis Marvin Hier and Abraham Cooper said in a statement that "such a threat mocks the founding principles of the UN, which was founded to defeat the genocidal Nazi Third Reich and to ensure that no nation would ever have to face the threat of annihilation. Failure to act to protect Israel's fundamental rights in the world body will not only further embolden Tehran's terrorist regime but calls into question the UN's continued raison d'etre," the rabbis stated.

In Toronto, the Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD), called the Iranian president's speech reminiscent of Adolf Hitler. However, the Coalition said the prime minister's condemnation was not good enough.

Martin, the CCD said, has refused to consider asking the UN for sanctions against Iran.

"Canada has signalled to Iran that there will be no consequences for threatening and inciting a Holocaust," said CCD president Alastair Gordon. "Imagine this regime modifying its behaviour because Pettigrew threatened them with a 'strong message'."

"Will Canada recall our ambassador from Tehran and send the Iranian ambassador back with a message that Canada wants no relationship with such a regime?" he asked.

USDS students meet Raptors GM

United Synagogue Day School middle school students were treated to a surprise meeting with Toronto Raptors general manager Rob Babcock prior to the Raptors' game against Maccabi Tel Aviv last month.

The students, who were taking part in a basketball clinic organized by the Raptors' development staff, got to take pictures, ask questions and hone their skills on the Raptors' home court at the Air Canada Centre.

"Playing on the Raptors' court was great," said Grade 8 student Noah Stern. "We first learned the basics – passing, shooting and ball handling – then we played [a game called] 'Dribble Knockout,' which was fun. At the end, Rob Babcock came out to speak to us. He was very nice and was willing to answer all our questions and give us his autograph."

Grade 7 student Orli Matlow said Babcock told the students that "he looks for players with character and for someone who works hard and is a good team person. He said that good character is important not just on the court, but in life. We learned a lot."

The clinic was offered to USDS students in grades 6, 7 and 8. The school sold more than 900 tickets to the Maccabi Tel Aviv game as a fundraiser.

"It was a great sports event," said parent Jay Feldman, an organizer of the USDS event. "But more importantly, from an educational point of view, it enabled Israel to come to life in a way that is meaningful to our children."

In addition to the clinic, the USDS Makhela (choir) also had the honour of singing O Canada and Hatikvah on the court before the game.

HOLY LAND HOCKEY TEAM

Israel's national junior hockey team concluded a six-city North American exhibition tour with a game in Toronto last weekend. They played Forest Hill Selects at the Pavilion Fitness Club before about 100 fans. Other stops on the goodwill tour included Montreal, Ottawa, New Jersey, Philadelphia and south Florida. Fichman to compete in pro tennis event in Toronto

Tennis star Sharon Fichman will join several up-and-coming Canadians competing in two professional events at Toronto's Rexall Centre this fall – the Tevlin Challenger for women and the Canada F1 Futures for men.

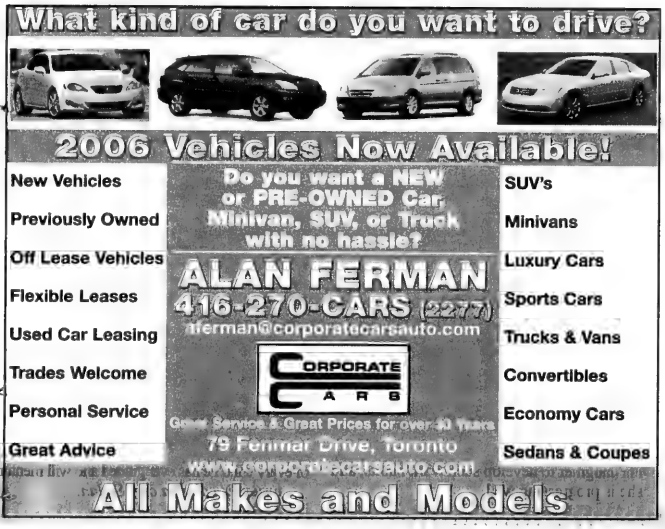
Fichman, the gold medalist in women's singles at last summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel, will join three members of Canada's Fed Cup squad – Alexandra Wozniak, Valérie Tétrault and Mélanie Gloria – in the tournament's main draw. Also entered is Canadian veteran Maureen Drake.

Fichman, Canada's 14-year-old flag bearer at the Maccabiah Games, won a bronze medal in the women's doubles and a silver in mixed doubles in Israel.

"Hosting entry-level professional events provides our young talent with opportunities to earn valuable ATP and Sony Ericsson WTA Tour world ranking points and prize money while competing at home," said Hatem McDadi, Tennis Canada's vice-president of tennis development.

"There is a strong and positive correlation between successful high performance tennis nations and the number of these domestic competitive opportunities."

The $25,000 Tevlin Challenger, funded by a $500,000 donation from the Tevlin family, will be held at the Rexall Centre Nov. 6 to 13.



Israel's national soccer coach resigns

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — National soccer coach Avraham Grant has resigned in the wake of his failure to lead Israel to the World Cup finals in Germany next year.

Israel finished third in European zone Group 4, behind France and Switzerland, despite being unbeaten in 10 World Cup qualifying matches, with four wins and six draws.

Grant, 50, had a one-hour meeting with Israel Football Association (IFA) chair Itche Menachem earlier this month before handing in his notice.

The search for a replacement has already begun, but Grant said he is willing to stay until the end of his contract, which runs until June, unless a suitable candidate is found first.

Hapoel Tel Aviv coach Dror Kashtan appears to be the frontrunner to replace Grant. Kashtan is under contract with the Tel Aviv team until the end of the current season, but his contract includes a release clause and he has close ties with the IFA chair.

Outspoken Maccabi Tel Aviv midfielder Eyal Berkovic, who has 82 caps for Israel, has also thrown his hat in the ring to replace Grant. In an interview with Channel 2 television, Berkovic said a younger coach is needed because older men have failed to take Israel to the World Cup since 1970.

"I am prepared to retire today... and coach the national team," said Berkovic, 35. "Maybe it's time to bring in new blood, people who understand today's players, their psyche."

Speaking to reporters after meeting with Grant, Menachem said that he was "surprised by [Grant's] timing... I asked him if his decision was final and he said it was."

Aging: a challenge for families

By MICHAEL GORDON

One of the great success stories of the past century and the first years of this century is the fact that people are living longer. Canada, like most western nations has experienced a dramatic shift in the distribution of its population, with those over the age of 85 making up the fastest growing proportion of the population.

The Senior Side of Life

It is expected that this trend will continue, and policy-makers and planners often wring their hands at the thought of the demands on the health-care system that this demographic shift implies. But for individuals and their families, the increasing likelihood of a long and fruitful life seems very promising.

It is the issue of what the later years will be like that is the area of concern expressed by most individuals and their families. Many families have already experienced the possible range of what can happen as people age, ranging from continuing to live full and meaningful long lives until the very end or close to it, or, on the less positive side, the development of levels of chronic illness of the body and mind that may gradually impair physical and mental function, a situation that affects all members of the family in some way as people try to find ways to function themselves or to help a loved one function to the best of his or her impaired ability.

Those of us committed to the care of the elderly look to the challenge of helping to define what it is that individuals might do to enhance the likelihood of their living a long and healthy life. If that is not possible, we try to look at what can be done to maintain or promote as productive and enjoyable a life as possible, even in the face of major medical problems.

There have been many advances in recent decades in medical diagnosis and treatment of the illnesses that afflict the elderly, but for some conditions, major breakthroughs have not occurred and we must struggle with assisting patients and their families cope with the ravages of chronic and progressive illness.

The challenge for families is to try to figure out how to care for loved ones without depriving them of their independence and dignity while trying to promote their safety and security even though they may not recognize fully the efforts of those family members who provide them with love and affection.

We see this, for example, in individuals with Alzheimer's and other dementias, or in those who have sustained a devastating stroke or suffer from a malignant condition. It is in the face of these and other challenges that families often demonstrate their strength, cohesiveness and determination to do the best they can for the older person they love.

Sometimes such a support system does not exist, which increases the challenge for the older person and for the professionals entrusted with his or her care.

In this column, I will try and address many of the common issues – clinical, social, ethical and professional – that are faced by families entrusted with caring for an older person. Because the column is written for The CJN, there will be times when a particularly Jewish perspective might enter into the discussions. The goal is to shed light and knowledge in the tradition of learning and loving so that readers can participate in what is often a challenging, at times terrifying, but hopefully humanely fulfilling journey. It is a journey that binds us together as a family and as a loving community.

CRÈME BRULÉE FRENCH TOAST

1/2 cup unsalted butter
1 cup firmly packed dark brown sugar
2 tblsp. corn syrup
6 (1" thick) slices day-old challah
5 lg. eggs
1 1/2 cups half-and-half
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 tsp. orange flavoured liqueur
1/4 tsp. salt

Combine butter, brown sugar, and corn syrup in heavy saucepan over med. heat. Cook, stirring constantly, until melted and smooth. Pour into a 13"x9" baking dish.

Trim crusts from bread and arrange in 1 layer in baking dish.

Whisk together eggs, half-and-half, vanilla, liqueur and salt in large mixing bowl. Pour evenly over bread. Cover, refrigerate overnight.

Preheat oven 350°F. Remove dish from refrigerator and let come to room temperature. Bake uncovered for 35-40 mins. or until puffed and edges are light golden brown. Serve immediately with individual pieces turned over with caramel on top. Yield: 8-10 servings. From "The Kosher Palette" Cookbook.

Epi on Education

Order from chaos

Seymour Epstein

If, as I stated in a previous article, schools and other educational ventures can't be evaluated in the same way as assembly lines or social services to the poor, surely they must still be assessed by some reliable measuring system. While we may not be sure of the long-range results of a specific pedagogic approach, we should be able to judge a school, youth group, Israel tour, or an adult education program in some way.

The first good sign in any organized bit of learning is if the teacher can present a reasonable plan of action. What are you teaching throughout this year? To what end? What are the methods you use for teaching? How well do you know the world of your students? What kind of passion do you have for this subject? And what training?

A parent might not want to pose these questions to a teacher on parents' night, but at some point a school should be able to answer these questions in a convincing manner.

You note that the content of the actual lessons is less important than the plan and the process. If you think back on your own schooling, you can't help but be amazed at how much you have forgotten. The teachers and camp counsellors who stand out in our memory are those who gave us the keys to future learning. What stays with us is the learning method, which we should be able to apply to new situations that require our own powers of discovery – and order.

So much of the passage from childhood to maturity is the ability to order reality, to categorize, and eventually to analyze. Most educational activity must in some way change chaos to order. Where there is no order, either in product or process, in subject matter or in technique, there is not much chance of learning.

These, then, are some of the ways to evaluate educational settings with methods that are specific to the learning process.

Insight into a child's soul

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

In his book For the Sake of Heaven: a Chronicle, Martin Buber writes about a child whose "mind has fallen into disorder" and was brought to the chassidic Rebbe of Lublin for discipline.

Buber writes that "instead of seeking to subdue him as is customary in such cases by powerful adjuration… [the boy and the Rebbe] carried on a far reaching conversation which was only interrupted by his own laughter or the rabbi's."

URBAN WRITER

Upon reading of this refreshing interaction between an adult and a child, my friend Burt Serfaty, a masterly father of two, came to mind. I called him on his cellphone, reaching him in Fairmont, W. Va., on business, and read him the excerpt. He liked it.

Over the last year, I have been privy to Burt's overall personal growth, including his increasingly sophisticated understanding of his children. Buber's story reminded me of Burt, because just as the Rebbe dealt wisely with the child – accepting and working with his energy and what lay beneath his "unruly" demeanour – Burt does the same with his children.

Burt does not have an academic background in child psychology, but he's a natural pied piper, playing and leading youth in an artful way with an ingenious appreciation of their innocent dispositions and unique and worthwhile views of the world.

A number of years ago, he was the director of the now defunct Sephardic Youth Alliance, a brilliantly run organization whose mission included local programming and missions to Israel. His creative, friendly and non-judgmental form of leadership influenced many young people to form a lifelong connection with Judaism and Israel.

One such individual who learned and benefitted from Burt's style is Rachel Lasry, a former director with Ve'ahavta who made aliyah and is making a splash in the world of Jewish humanitarian relief work. Rachel, who had been a colleague of mine since 2000, says she attributes much of her love for community, Zionism and Judaism to Burt.

Burt and I hang out a couple of times a week. We shmooze like buddies do. I talk to him about working in Sub-Saharan Africa and he tells me about the diverse needs of children, which he has discovered through empirical data, books he is reading and discussions he has with professionals at schools such as the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Academy.

He relates fascinating insights. For instance, unlike our parents, who used stiff methods to ensure that we completed our homework, many experts now say some children require peripheral sound – such as a radio – when they study in order to focus better. Burt has encouraged his daughter to develop such work habits, and she is progressing well.

Burt communicates with his son and daughter all the time, especially in areas that excite and interest them. Knowing a holiday is approaching, he will schedule an adventure such as a tour of Kensington Market – explaining in great detail about the neighbourhood's historical significance for Jewish immigrants and other newcomers.

If his children can't sit for a long time in shul, he encourages them to express themselves through play and interaction with their synagogue friends. Burt believes he will won't win a battle of wills with his children to be patient, so like the Rebbe of Lublin, he goes with their natural flow – always steering it gently, thoughtfully and strategically.

I have learned a great deal about human behaviour from my friend as I have witnessed his keen insight into the hearts and minds of little people and youth. I am happy for him as he uncovers his personal gift and believe his legacy will be the imprint he leaves on the soul of every child he has ever guided and will mentor.

GA convenes in Toronto

Delegates gather from North America, Britain and Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Prime Minister Paul Martin will address the annual General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (UJC), which brings together Jewish community leaders from all over North America, as well as Israel.

For the first time in 21 years, the GA is back in Toronto, and local organizers are looking forward to showing off the city to a crowd of up to 3,000 delegates. This year, there are also delegates from Great Britain. The mega-meeting will be held at the Toronto Convention Centre from Nov. 13 to 15.

The GA kicks off officially Sunday night with an opening plenary at which Martin speaks. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has been invited to speak the following night.

Other speakers include philanthropist Charles Bronfman, Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Jerusalem Post editor David Horovitz, historian Deborah Lipstadt and McGill University principal Heather Monroe-Blum. Ben Stein of Comedy Central and actress Valerie Harper, now playing Golda Meir in a touring production of Golda's Balcony, are also on the program. Harper is scheduled to perform excerpts from the show.

Debbie Kimel, who is co-chairing the GA with Peter Ekstein, said there will be two Toronto booths at the event's "Global Jewish Marketplace," which will be open to the public on Saturday, Nov. 12, in the evening. The marketplace will feature Israeli and North American vendors including silversmiths and art galleries, as well as representatives of different organizations. On the Saturday night, there will be entertainment by the Winnipeg-based Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble.

Kimel, who has been attending the GA for about a decade, said she's formed "wonderful friendships" and been motivated at those meetings to contribute more to her community. She hopes new leadership will be similarly inspired by Toronto's GA.

The chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Zeev Bielski, another GA veteran, hopes that Israeli delegates will also be inspired. In a phone interview from Ra'anana, where he served as mayor before becoming chair of the Jewish Agency executive earlier this year, he told The CJN that at his first GA some 20 years ago, he was struck by "the beauty of [the] partnership" between Israel and North American Jewish leaders.

The legacy of Yitzhak Rabin

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

As world leaders gather in Israel to commemorate the 10th anniversary of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, Israelis are asking to what extent the killer's bullet changed the course of Israeli-Palestinian history.

Had Rabin lived, would the Israeli-Palestinian conflict have been resolved? Or would the peace process he started still have unravelled?

Analysis

Please also see page 9

The latter possibility raises additional questions: If Rabin had realized that the Oslo process was a debacle, would he have continued to insist on a negotiated peace deal? Or, like Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, would Rabin have concluded that without a credible Palestinian peace partner, Israel should set its borders unilaterally?

The legacy Rabin left is not simple. His life as soldier and peacemaker underlined the Sisyphean struggle to keep Israel strong and, when possible, to cut peace deals with its neighbours. His death highlighted the need for greater tolerance in Israel's politically divided society.

A decade after the assassination, it's not clear how much of Rabin's legacy has been implemented. Though left-wing politicians such as Yossi Beilin, who sponsored the 2003 "Geneva Accord" peace initiative, try to present themselves as the successors to Rabin's legacy, a recent poll in the Yediot Achronot newspaper shows that 24 per cent of Israelis see Sharon – the Likud party leader who vehemently

Faith Courts Opposed

MONTREAL — Nearly two-thirds of Canadians – 63 per cent – oppose giving religious courts the rights to settle family disputes such as divorce, child custody and inheritance, says a new poll done for the Montreal-based Centre for Information and Research on Canada. The poll of 3,201 people, conducted in late September by CROP in Quebec and Environics elsewhere, also found that 63 per cent of Canadians oppose extending legally sanctioned faith-based arbitration to Muslim sharia courts, the Ottawa Citizen reported. Opposition to all faith-based arbitration was highest in Ontario, where Premier Dalton McGuinty has said his government would end legal backing for the practice.

March Deadline Soon

TORONTO — Deadline to register for the 2006 March of the Living, which is expected to draw 500 Canadian Jewish high schoolers and chaperones to Poland and Israel, is Nov. 17. The annual event for students from around the world recalls those murdered by the Nazis in the Shoah. It runs from April 23 to May 7. Register at www.marchoftheliving.org.

Zundel Sues Ottawa

OTTAWA — Ernst Zundel is seeking $10 million from Ottawa for illegally holding him in solitary confinement and deporting him, he said in a lawsuit filed last week in Federal Court. The Holocaust denier was sent to Germany last March, where he was charged with inciting hatred and jailed. He was to be tried there this week. Last winter, a Federal Court judge said Zundel is a threat to national security and that his detention under the secretive security certificate process was reasonable. His case will be heard Nov. 23.

Liberal Imam Pressed

VANCOUVER — A Muslim group has failed to get a court to stop an imam from Senegal who holds interfaith dialogues with Jews from leading prayers at Vancouver's Masjid Ul-Haqq mosque. The Fijian- and Indian-dominated British Columbia Muslim Association, which says it represents B.C.'s 50,000 Sunni Muslims, tried to get a court injunction in late October against Imam Fode Drame because, his supporters say, of his liberal approach to Islam and for organizing events with Rabbi David Mivasair of Ahavat Olam congregation that bring Muslims and Jews together. The group, which earlier fired Drame, wouldn't comment, RNS reported.

Don't Sell Off Square Naming Rights: CJC

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region said it has serious concerns about a Toronto city councillor's suggestion last week about selling naming rights for Nathan Phillips Square to help cover $40 million in maintenance and renovation costs at the famous site.

"A decision like that would be tantamount to selling Toronto's history," said CJC Ontario Chair Joel Richler. "The election of Nathan Phillips in 1955 as Toronto's first Jewish mayor was a historic watershed for our city. It marked the transformation of Ontario's capital from a unicultural enclave to the modern, multicultural city that it remains today."

Etobicoke Centre Councillor Doug Holyday made the renaming suggestion following a report from the city's auditor general that said Toronto faces a city-wide maintenance backlog of $500 million, including $40 million alone for Nathan Phillips Square, which sits next to Toronto City Hall.

Richler said Phillips was directly responsible for ensuring that Toronto City Hall was built with its present design, leaving a legacy that includes Toronto's most recognizable symbol and its most important public space.

WORLD

Anti-Jewish Series Airs

TEHRAN — Iranian television broadcast a miniseries alleging that the Mossad killed a French Jewish academic before he could publish "proof" the Nazi gas chambers were used for delousing, not to murder Jews. Holocaust, a three-part drama, was aired by the Sahar TV station last month just as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad made calls for Israel to be "wiped off the map." The terror group Hezbollah, whose Al-Manar TV station has produced anti-Semitic shows, provided actors for the series.

Restitution Upheld

BERLIN — Germany's High Court last month paved the way for heirs of one of Germany's most successful prewar Jewish families to get restitution. The decision against the KarstadtQuelle company upholds one in favour of the heirs to the Wertheim department store chain. The money came from the sale of family property that was seized by the Nazis in the 1930s, then bought by a private company in 1994 after the fall of Communism in East Germany. The decision is the first over multiple claims to 24 acres in Berlin once held by the Wertheim family. Sale proceeds will go to the Claims Conference, which will give 80 per cent to heirs and the rest to programs for survivors.

Orthodox shul donates Torah to Reform congregation

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Two shuls in Kitchener-Waterloo with very different belief systems were able to put their differences aside last month when the Orthodox Beth Jacob Congregation agreed to donate a Torah to the Reform Temple Shalom.

"This was a good opportunity to bring the two communities together," said Rabbi Joseph Bloch of Beth Jacob.

"At first there was a bit of trepidation, because the relations between the two shuls haven't always been good. It required some thought, but the [Beth Jacob] executives came to a unanimous decision to donate the Torah."

Doug Dykaar, the president of Temple Shalom, said he is grateful the Beth Jacob leadership made the right decision, and he gives them all the credit.

"I think it is quite a big deal, because I understand that there are significant differences [between the congregations], so I consider it well done on their part," Dykaar said.

He said the need to replace Temple Shalom's only Torah had become acute.

"This opportunity came up because our Torah is a Holocaust-era Torah and it has seen a lot of use. It got to the point where it was becoming illegible."

After requesting to borrow a Torah from the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism, it occurred to Martin Levene, a member of Temple Shalom and a former president of Beth Jacob, that the Orthodox shul could help.

Dykaar said that Levene still knew many Beth Jacob congregants and also knew that the shul had Torahs that were not being used.

Once Temple Shalom made a formal request, and an investigation was made to make sure the transfer would be halachically proper, there was only one option, said Bernard Papernick, Beth Jacob's president.

"The fact is, we had more Torahs than we required, and they only had one. The feeling was one of gratitude on their part, and we are very grateful we were able to help," Papernick said.

"Despite the fact that there are major differences between Orthodox and Reform, they were willing to give us a Torah scroll because the mitzvah was larger than any reservation they might have had," Dykaar added.

The ceremony, which took place on Erev Simchat Torah, was very minimal, Papernick said, adding that it was a straightforward transfer attended by only a few members of the community.

'Buy Israeli' at the GA

Just in time for Chanukah, Torontonians can buy quality goods directly from Israel at this month's United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto.

As part of the GA, Nov. 13 to 16 at the Metro Convention Centre, the Government of Israel's economic mission to Canada is organizing an Israeli consumer products fair.

The GA's "Global Jewish Marketplace" – to be held Saturday, Nov. 12, at the convention centre from 7:30 to 11:00 p.m., prior to the assembly's official opening the next day – gives Israeli vendors the opportunity to reach thousands of delegates from across North America, as well as members of the general public and the Toronto Jewish community.

After the GA, the fair moves uptown to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, where it will be open to the public from 10:00 a.m. to 10:00 p.m. on Wednesday, Nov. 16.

Admission to both is free.

Israel's ambassador speaks

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, has spent virtually an entire lifetime choosing his words carefully. He measures his message much like a sculptor carving his clay, until the statement is clear.

Before he presented his credentials to the Governor General almost two years ago, he spent nearly two decades as legal adviser in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, much of that time involved in negotiations with Palestinian officials, including Mahmoud Abbas, now the head of the Palestinian Authority.

From the editor's desk

A conversation with the ambassador yields no ambiguities of thought or muddled expressions – except perhaps on the part of the interviewer. The CJN spoke with him by phone last week at his office in Ottawa.

What were some of the key issues, I wanted to know, that he planned to discuss with participants at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, meeting in Toronto in mid-November?

"Unfortunately, none," he answered, explaining that he was not given the opportunity to do so. He was "disappointed," he told me that the program organizers in New York had not thought to invite him to address delegates. This, I thought, was regrettable, an avoidable squandering of the possibility of the gift of his insights.

In poor substitute, I asked him to speak to the assembly, as it were, through The CJN. What follows is an excerpt of our conversation.

The foremost concern he expressed for North American Jewry was over the troubling situation on campus.

"The campus is where our future leaders, in the Jewish and broader communities, are moulded.

"Yet there are concerted activities by certain Islamic and even Christian organizations to push an anti-Israel agenda there to try to influence the minds of our youth. Our community leaders must invest whatever resources are necessary to counter this campaign."

Speaking emphatically, the British-born diplomat added, "Having been raised outside Israel, I appreciate the importance of a strong Jewish community using its resources to develop and maintain itself.

"Each community has an obligation to its own future. It must ensure education in Judaism and about Israel is given to every child. That [Jewish] education must be widely available and effective.

"For support of Israel to be strong, there has to be a strong local Jewish community."

On the subject of the peace process, he said he is "frustrated with Abbas. I had hoped that he would have established himself as a leader, but the fact is he has not. He is not doing what he could – without getting into an armed civil war with other Palestinian factions. Indeed, his own Fatah group is involved in committing acts of terror. Abbas thinks he can put together a viable administration without disarming terrorists. But he is wrong. And Israelis are despondent and worried about this.

Alan Baker

"Until Israelis are confident that terrorism won't be used against us, it will be difficult to get back to serious negotiations with him. The majority of the Israeli public will not authorize the government of Israel to negotiate in circumstances where there is no serious effort by the other side to curtail terror.

"Thus, we are trying to urge countries, such as Canada, to help Abbas do what needs to be done and what he has promised he would do under the 'road map' [peace plan], namely, dismantle terror."

Baker acknowledged that "Canada is enhancing its role in the peace process in co-ordination with Israel, trying to help the Palestinians build up their own viable government structure.

"Bilateral relations between Canada and Israel," he said, "are positive. In fact," he added, "during the last year, they have taken an upgrade with Canada's decision to take a more pro-active role at the UN."

He said that he enjoyed excellent relations with Canada's Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew. "When there is a need to discuss matters, we can do so immediately. There are also very good, friendly relations between [Canadian] Prime Minister [Paul] Martin and [Israeli] Prime Minister [Ariel] Sharon. This is very important."

But still, notwithstanding this "upgrade in relations," Baker expressed the hope that "Canada will change its voting pattern in the General Assembly in which it usually follows the series of anti-Israel resolutions."

As a way of encouraging Canadians to trade in the Middle East, Baker announced that he and his colleague, the Jordanian ambassador to Canada, are jointly visiting Vancouver later this month to boost trade in the region and to palpably demonstrate that where there is good will, mutually beneficial trading relations are viable. The two ambassadors will be visiting and speaking on campuses, and with various trade officials, Jewish and non-Jewish alike.

We also spoke about Iran, the fight against terrorism, the withdrawal from Gaza, and relations with local Christian and Muslim communities. Baker ended the conversation, however, with a plea that "as strong as the communities are, we have to be united and coordinated within ourselves and with Israel."

Sabeel conference not funded by taxes: CIDA

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A federal agency is denying an allegation from Stockwell Day, the Conservative Party of Canada's foreign affairs critic, that tax dollars were used to help fund a Toronto conference on divesting from Israel.

In an Oct. 28 statement, Day noted that among the four-day conference's sponsors was Toronto-based KAIROS, the Canadian Ecumenical Justice Initiatives, which "has received $2.9-million from the Canadian International Development Agency over the past two years, despite the stance that it has taken firmly on one side of the [Middle East] debate.

"It is inappropriate for taxpayer dollars that are supposed to be used for humanitarian aid, to be directed at campaigns attacking Israel," Day stated.

On Oct. 27, Day wrote to Aileen Carroll, the minister of international co-operation, and foreign affairs minister Pierre Pettigrew, raising the same issues.

He pointed out that the Oct. 26-29 pro-divestment conference in Toronto was organized by the Canadian Friends of Sabeel, whose parent group, the Jerusalem-based Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology Center, "has been criticized broadly for indifference to the security concerns of Israel and for [its] uncritical support of the Palestinian cause."

Day asked the government why it was supporting "only one side of the Middle East dispute," and what was being done "to ensure an equitable representation of the situation."

He also wanted to know what steps Ottawa will take "to stop the taxpayer funding of groups lobbying for Israel's disinvestment."

Eleonora Karabatic, a spokesperson for the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), said no tax dollars were spent on the Sabeel conference.

"There were no CIDA funds used for this event," Karabatic told The CJN.

She said KAIROS, a coalition of church groups committed to social justice issues, receives funds from CIDA but that strict rules prohibit spending for partisan or political purposes.

Asked how it is possible to monitor KAIROS's spending, Karabatic said all beneficiaries of CIDA funds must account for every penny spent.

"Whatever we do fund has to be accountable," Karabatic told The CJN. "CIDA takes that very seriously."

She said the federal agency funds KAIROS "but for other programs."

From 2003 through 2006, CIDA's contribution to KAIROS will total $3.3 million. Karabatic noted that CIDA funds go toward specific projects, including working with Palestinian and Israeli women on peace-building and training people in human rights protection.

Day was attending the Summit of the Americas conference in Argentina last week and was unavailable to comment on CIDA's response to his charges.

Mary Corkery, executive director of KAIROS, told The CJN she was offended by Day's statement because it was incorrect.

"Had he called us beforehand, he would have known that [his allegation] was untrue. No CIDA funds were used by KAIROS [to help fund the Sabeel conference]."

Corkery said her organization has no position on divestment.

"We support the State of Israel and a just state for Palestinians. We think Israel's occupation is a violation of human rights. That's not the same as being against Israel.

"Our position is consistent with international law."

KAIROS also funds a peace project in Israel called Bat Shalom, she noted.

The Sabeel conference, which was dubbed "A Call for Morally Responsible Investment: A Nonviolent Response to the Israeli Occupation," was sponsored by more than 50 church, para-church, peace and community groups, including about five Jewish ones, in addition to the United Church of Canada, the country's largest Protestant denomination.

It featured at least one address by the head of Sabeel, the 68-year-old Anglican Canon Naim Ateek, who has been widely denounced by Jewish and Christian activists for vilifying Jews and Israel.

Austrian funds compensate victims of Nazis

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Hannah Lessing has heard the complaints about her native Austria before – that the country hasn't really acknowledged its role in the Holocaust, that it paints itself as the first victim of Hitler, not his willing partner, that right-wing radical Joerg Haider is dangerously popular.

That description of her homeland is out of date, and has been for years, she contends.

As proof, she points to several compensation funds established by Austria to assist elderly survivors and their heirs as well as public statements by senior Austrian officials recognizing the central European country's role in the Holocaust.

Lessing, whose grandmother was killed in Auschwitz in 1944 and whose father fled to Palestine, is secretary of the National Fund of Austria for Victims of National Socialism as well as secretary general of the General Settlement Fund.

The funds are part of a broad Austrian effort to in some small way make amends for its cruel treatment of Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the Nazis, she said. Other efforts of the Austrian government have been directed toward supporting soup kitchens in Ukraine, bringing elderly survivors to Austria for medical treatment, funding Holocaust education programs and in publicly acknowledging what it had done during the war.

For many survivors, the acknowledgement of Austrian wrongdoing is as important, if not more important, than the actual compensation they received, she said.

Austria's National Fund was established in 1995 and paid out a symbolic amount of approximately $7,000 each to individuals persecuted during World War II. Altogether, about $215 million was disbursed to almost 30,000 applicants.

> 'Austria has gone a long way to recognizing its role in the war and compensating its victims'

In 2001, the fund began payments to persons who lost property in Austria, including apartment leases and personal valuables. Approximately 20,000 applicants received up to $12,200 each, with $255 million being allocated in total.

A Reconciliation Fund was set up in 2000 to pay between $500 and $10,830 to victims of Nazi forced and slave labour.

In 2001, following negotiations between Austria and the United States, a General Settlement Fund was established with the intent of increasing restitution by Austria.

"It is a voluntary fund that will provide payments to victims, their heirs and communal organizations that suffered losses or damages as a result of or in connection with events having occurred on the territory of present-day Austria during the Nazi era," states an Austrian government document.

The fund was endowed with $250 million and so far about 20,000 applications have been received.

Money has yet to be disbursed, Lessing said, because of an ongoing class-action law suit in the United States against Austria and Austrian companies. Most of the litigants have agreed to the compensation plan but one lawyer, representing about 17 clients in the Whiteman case, has so far declined to do so.

Until that suit is settled, the funds cannot be disbursed, she said, adding there is a plan in the works to start making "down payments" to from 5,000 to 6,000 survivors, perhaps as early as December. She said she expected most of the fund to be distributed by March 2006.

Lessing said the funds cannot fully compensate victims of the Nazis, but they do indicate a sea change in Austria's attitude to its role in World War II.

For years "Austria hid behind the claim they were the first victims of Nazis," she said. "The atmosphere changed during the [Kurt] Waldheim elections and the attack by Jewish groups that Austria hadn't addressed it."

In 1991, Franz Vranitzky, then head of the government, admitted publicly that many Austrians had joined the Nazi machinery and in June 1995 the first compensation fund, the National Fund, was established.

Austrian compensation funds have broad public support and of their 160 employees in Vienna, only five are Jewish. "They all believe in what they're doing," Lessing said.

And as for Haider, he received only 1.6 per cent of the vote in a recent provincial election, she added.

Hannah Lessing

Lessing was working in marketing when she was asked by the speaker of the Austrian parliament to take over the National Fund a few months after it was created.

She agreed to take on the task if three conditions were met: an office would be created in Vienna where survivors could come and be heard; she would be allowed to travel to survivor communities around the world to publicize the fund; and the government would "write a letter where they will say we're sorry" while acknowledging the restitution effort came too late and that there is no way to fully compensate victims of the Nazis.

Lessing said all points have been met. An estimated 15,000 survivors have visited her Vienna office, she has spoken to an estimated 8,000 survivors around the world, including 550 in Canada, and an apology letter was sent to successful applicants.

Lessing believes Austria has gone a long way to recognizing its role in the war and compensating its victims. Survivors often wrote to her explaining "what it felt like to be sent out of their home country. The $7,000 sent was important and made a difference, but what really made a difference was the letter that said Austria is sorry," she said.

Canada a 'soft target' for terrorists: Israeli expert

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Islamic fundamentalist terrorism is a greater danger to global peace and security today than Soviet nuclear arms were a generation ago, a top Israeli terrorist expert warned last week.

"International jihadist terrorism represents the biggest threat and challenge to humanity in modern times, more so than the Cold War," Boaz Ganor told a Canada-Israel Committee briefing in Toronto.

Ganor reminded his audience that Osama bin Laden, the spiritual father of jihadist terrorism and a fugitive sought by the United States and its allies, has mentioned Canada as a future target.

Canada, a pillar of the West and an ally of the United States, was described as a "soft target" by Ganor, the deputy dean of the Lauder School of Government and Diplomacy at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

Ganor said that Al Qaeda, the group that destroyed the World Trade Center in Manhattan on Sept. 11, 2001, was formed after the 1979 Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The Islamic fighters who successfully resisted the invasion with American help morphed into jihadists who turned their arms against the West and moderate Muslim regimes.

They are dangerous because of their military experience, their religious devotion to radical Islam and their simplistic black-and-white view of the world, he added.

"They know exactly what they're doing. These guys are the best there is in terrorism."

Ganor said that modern, moderate Muslim governments are their number 1 enemy.

By attacking targets in such pro-western countries as Morocco and Indonesia, Bin Laden and his confederates are trying to shake the status quo and the strength and stability of these nations.

Al Qaeda and its affiliates also want to drive western troops and influence out of the Middle East and weaken Israel, he pointed out.

But their main objective is to create a pan-Islamic state.

And so the responsibility for dealing with the phenomenon of Islamic extremism lies with Muslims themselves. He called on Islamic scholars to come forward and refute their teachings in a counterterrorism offensive.

Such bombings are very effective. Less than one per cent of the attacks launched by Palestinians since the outbreak of the second intifadah five years ago have been suicide bombings. But they have caused the most damage.

In a dire warning, Ganor said that jihadists may yet resort to using biological, chemical and nuclear weapons. "Non-conventional terrorism is knocking on our door."

Jihadists are potentially more dangerous that the now-defunct Soviet Union because their calculations and decision-making processes do not conform to western standards or values, he suggested. "They have a different set of rationales."

Liberal democratic governments can best confront jihadists by limiting their operational capabilities and lowering their motivations, Ganor said.

No country has yet succeeded in striking a balance between these poles. But for now, countries should place more emphasis on counterterrrorism in their hierarchy of national interests.

In comments about Canada, Ganor said that Canadian security services are better prepared to fight jihadist terrorism today than they were before 2001.

But Canada still remains vulnerable. Its ethnic diversity and neutrality will not protect it from attack.

According to Ganor, Al Qaeda can easily recruit Canadian Muslims as foot soldiers. Such activists represent a small, marginal component of the Muslim population in Canada.

But Canadians should not be complacent. In Europe, the majority of terrorist attacks have been perpetrated by second-generation Muslims indoctrinated by Islamic radicalism.

After delivering his speech, Ganor flew to Ottawa to testify before the House of Commons' subcommittee on public safety and national security.

Welcome GA delegates: there is much work to do

The General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities is an annual celebration of organized, communal Jewish life in North America. It brings together thousands of participants – professionals, lay leaders, volunteers and activists of all ages, affiliations and opinions – representing some 155 Jewish federations and 400 independent (non-federation) communities across the continent.

And there is indeed much to celebrate. For day in and day out, men and women in large and small communities alike dedicate their lives to the betterment of the lives of unknown others who may live close by or, just as likely, far away, across oceans, low valleys, wide plains and high peaks in Europe, Asia, South America and, of course, Israel.

Generosity – whether of funds, of self or of time – is the sustaining essence that courses through the diverse activities and humanitarian causes that the numerous federations underwrite. And this too, in all its manifestations, is worthy of celebration.

But celebration is only part of the purpose of the annual general assembly. It is foremost an occasion to bring together leading thinkers, visionaries and teachers to remind us of our core purposes and to inspire us to strive even higher.

Though the Jewish horizon sparkles with achievement, large and worrisome "issues" lurk just beyond the sunrise. We are all familiar with them. Their outlines seem to perpetually cloud the Jewish future. Chief among them, though not by any means in any comprehensive listing, are:

- the perplexing, seemingly irreversible slide downward in the sheer numbers of Jews in North America;
- the unconscionable burden for so many families of the high cost of Jewish day school education;
- the vanishing sense of Jewish literacy among large swaths of North American Jews;
- the collaboration of anti-Semites, terrorists and Islamic jihadists in one frenzied phalanx intent on destroying Israel; and, remarkably,
- the expanding disinterest in Israel among increasing numbers of the younger generation of Jews.

The federations and the federation system are the means of our collective striving. They are both a proof and an affirmation of our inter-connectedness and inter-dependence as a people. They are not ends in and of themselves.

Thus, we bid welcome to the GA delegates. But, lest their speeches and slogans fall like stones without weight into a lake of self-reflection and self-congratulation, leaving no ripple or long-lasting resonance, we convey our hope that their many deliberations and discussions yield a sense of ever-present urgency to the issues of the modern Jewish condition. Celebrate indeed, but remember too that there is much work to do at home and abroad.

PM should recall ambassador to Iran

We universally condemn in the strongest possible terms the hateful remarks made by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad last week regarding "Zionists" and the State of Israel.

The views espoused by the Iranian government do not deserve to count among the voices of civilized nations. As such, Canada should heed the recommendation of the State of Israel in asking that Iran be removed as a member state of the United Nations. In addition, we urge Prime Minister Paul Martin and the Canadian government to recall Canada's ambassador to Iran as a sign of protest and dissent.

After the Iranian president's remarks and considering the still-unresolved circumstances surrounding the murder of Canadian citizen and journalist Zahra Kazemi, Canada must stand with the rest of the world in denouncing such hatred and intolerance.

Gov't should stand up to Iran

There is no room in this world for leaders of governments such as Iran's to publicly rally for the extermination of Israel as a Jewish state.

The Canadian government, as much of the rest of the world did, stood by while this type of rhetoric was directed against Jews before World War II, and look what happened. This time, Canada should lead by example and act to recall its delegates to Iran as a protest to that government's threatening policy, and it should urge other countries to do the same.

It is better to deal with such issues head on than to try to deal with them when they can no longer be controlled. In the words of philosopher Edmund Burke, "The only thing necessary for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing."

By standing up to such hatemongers, we can make the difference between the survival or the unimaginable loss of Israel and the Jewish home. In so doing, we not only discourage Iran from thinking it can carry out its threats, but also all others who happen to sympathize with Iran. Believe me, Iran is not alone, just like Germany was not alone. We must not allow Germany to happen all over again.

Divesting from Israel (1)

Churches and other organizations with interests in Israel should think twice before signing on to any such divestment campaign (Conference on divesting in Israel cause of concern, Oct. 27, CJN).

If church groups are looking at their investments from a moral point of view, then they should carefully consider the human rights record of every country on the planet and divest from the worst offenders first. If that approach were followed then Israel would be one of the last countries subject to divestment. It so happens that the Palestinian Authority and many Arab countries would be much higher on the list then Israel.

I am appalled that any church would have the temerity to ignore Palestinian terrorism and concentrate solely on punishing Israel for defending itself against terrorism. Divesting from Israel as a "non-violent" strategy is pure nonsense because it ignores the causes of the violence, the dangers of Muslim radicalism and the threat of those dictatorships who use the Palestinians to take revenge against the only non-Islamic state in the region that they want to destroy.

The reason churches are targeting Israel has nothing to do with sympathy for Palestinians or a desire to really help the Palestinian cause – it is a red herring for a strong strain of anti-Semitism still running through certain churches.

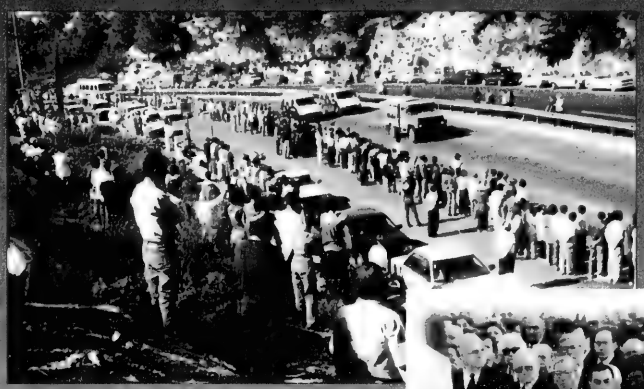
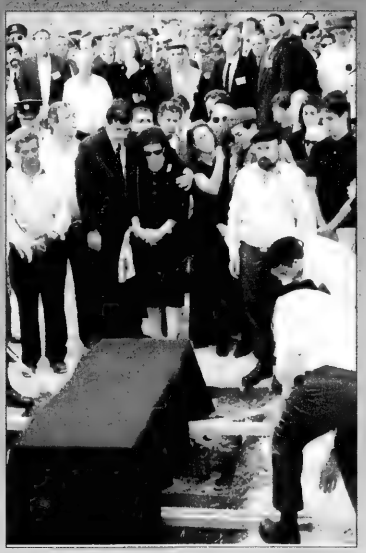
10 years since his murder





These photos show a handful of scenes related to the horrible moment ten years ago – on the 11th day of Cheshvan, Nov. 4 – when the assassin Yigal Amir shot Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in the back in the darkness of a motza'ei Shabbat after a peace rally in Tel Aviv.

Clockwise from left are the famous handshake with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat on the White House lawn on Sept. 13, 1993, two years before Rabin was killed; Rabin and King Hussein of Jordan exchange greetings after the peace treaty between their two countries was signed in 1994; Rabin at the peace rally moments before he was killed; his family bidding their last farewells at his funeral; some of the dignitaries who attended the funeral, including then German chancellor Helmut Kohl, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and then U.S. president Bill Clinton; a young woman pausing for a moment of reflection at the memorial erected at the assassination site; and the tribute to the slain prime minister by the hundreds of thousands of Israelis who lined the route of the motorcade carrying his body to his burial place on Mount Herzl.

Jews by surprise

Former U.S. secretary of state Madeleine Albright is not unique in being the child of parents born in eastern Europe who had concealed their Jewishness. There are many individuals from that part of the world who, as adults, have been surprised to discover that they are Jews.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Their parents kept it from them ostensibly to shield them from potential persecution. Traumatized by the Holocaust, they were determined to protect their offspring from the kind of suffering they had to endure.

But the world of their children is radically different. Because it's "in" to be Jewish nowadays, most are thrilled by their discovery. Even when they find it hard to embrace Judaism and adopt a Jewish lifestyle, they wish to identify with the Jewish people and learn more about Judaism.

They regard their Jewishness not as a burden but as a privilege. Often it also helps them to understand themselves better as people.

In Poland, for example, there are some whose Jewish parents did not survive. They were taken in by non-Jews as babes in arms and brought up as Catholics. Relatives who might have had the right to claim them did not survive either. Some discovered as adults that they are Jews and returned to the Jewish fold. Many others have remained ignorant of their roots or do not wish to publicly disclose their Jewish birth.

The birth mother of Father Romuald Waszkinel gave him up to a Catholic family just days after he was born in the local ghetto. He became a priest. His adopted mother told him the truth when he was an adult, shortly before she died. His birth parents had perished, but he found his father's brother, an Orthodox Jew, in Israel.

Their physical resemblance was striking, but their religious convictions were poles apart. Father Romuald has remained true to his calling, but is very proud of his origins. Since he was never named by his birth parents, he obtained papal permission to add the name of his birth father to his. He is now Jacob-Romuald Wechsler-Waszkinel. In addition to his academic work as a professor of French, he dedicates his life to Jewish-Christian understanding.

He is one of the most attractive human beings it has been my privilege to meet. Because he doesn't speak English, he could only address audiences in Montreal during his recent visit to Canada. But, English or no English, he is worth meeting and I hope he will be invited to English Canada, too.

He is, indeed, a committed Christian, but the pintele Yid (the Jewish "dot"), that ineffable trait of Jewishness, has remained with him. He says it has strengthened his Christian faith. The surprise of his origin has added depth and joy to his existence.

Sights and sounds on the way to school

On any given morning, thousands of students make their way to their various institutes of higher learning. A large number of these students use public transportation, transferring to and from buses as they cross the city in a mad and often futile rush to get to class on time. On one of the rare morning bus rides when I was doing something other than catching up on lost sleep, I began to take notice of new things about the bus.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

The first was the smell.

I'm not sure which committee on the transit board gets to decide, but I know from long experience that each bus is individually scented (and I'm not talking about dangling pine trees and new leather scent). I know, for example, that the bus I took yesterday smelled like old socks and salami. The day before that, I got on a vomit-and-licorice bus that was not for the faint of nose.

Each bus also collects its own unique variety of graffiti. Many people argue that graffiti is a legitimate art form, but I suspect that they have never seen true bus graffiti. "DAM DA POLIC" may mean something in a language I don't speak, but personally I think it's the drunken thoughts of someone who failed kindergarten. Repeatedly.

The people are, of course, the most interesting part of any bus ride. First and foremost is the bus driver. If the bus were a pirate ship, the bus driver would be the captain in a children's story, with eye-patch, hook-hand, peg leg and parrot included. Bus drivers are some of the friendliest and most bored people in existence. They will talk about anything to anyone, usually offering personal anecdotes that lead me to conclude many of them are spies for the government when not on the job.

Among those sitting in the bus, there is usually at least one person whose state of mental health we can only guess at. My favourite is the old man who compulsively signals a stop – every 10 seconds. He doesn't want to get off, and he doesn't know anyone else who does either. Still, every 10 seconds he pulls the cord and then looks around innocently. This is also a very effective method for learning new curses courtesy of the bus driver. Perhaps the old man is really a linguist.

Another staple of the bus ride is "Music Boy." Usually sitting as far back on the bus as possible without actually sitting next to anyone, this character is likely to be in his early teens and wearing a hooded sweatshirt and torn jeans. His role is to stick earphones in or on his ears, and immediately crank the volume up so loud that anyone in passing cars can sing along with him. His ultimate goal also appears to be to gain the attention of the bus driver, so perhaps he is also some kind of linguist.

One of my favourite activities on the bus is playing a game I call "Mental Subtitles." The only thing you need is the inevitable pair of people who are speaking loudly in a language other than English. Just because I don't know the language they are using doesn't mean I can't make up my own dialogue in my head.

Woman A: "So what does your new boyfriend do for a living?"

Woman A: "Maybe that's a second job. All the bus drivers I have met are spies for a living, or fighter jet pilots."

Woman B: "Do you smell salami?"

Finally, some people who are unable to catch up on their sleep begin to take notice of things on the bus.

Anyone smell socks?

It's important to get off your duff sometimes

Individuality is defined as having unique characteristics and qualities that distinguishes a person or thing from others.

Going to school in Halifax has taught me the importance of being self-reliant. It has also influenced me to become more independent and to be more open to trying new things.

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

For many students, I believe the decision to come here is sparked by a desire for change and a hunger to live a more individualistic lifestyle. Our hunger could, in part, be satisfied by living a couple years of university life, but it takes more than sitting on our comfy couches and stuffing ourselves with frozen food to make that happen.

Socially, Halifax is filled with musicians, athletes, and artists – people we students often choose to neglect because exploring a new part of the city requires us to actually move our underused limbs. There are also many outdoor activities to experience in and around Halifax, such as camping trips and other adventures, that make this city unique.

Prior to becoming a university student, I never needed to be self-reliant. I was lucky enough to have loving, supportive parents, and a mother who cooked for our family on a nightly basis.

First year was a breeze for me, living in residence. But in second year, two friends and I began living large in an old, mouse-infested house, and the fact I no longer had the luxury of living with a Jewish mother struck me like a bolt of lighting.

As far as keeping our house clean, my roommates and I failed miserably. We had more mice than your average dump, and let me tell you, these were intelligent little critters. We bought traps, cheese, peanut butter and various other things associated with attracting and killing mice, but the little guys didn't bite! We caught one mouse during the entire school year, and seeing that little lifeless rodent may have been our proudest moment of the 2004/2005 academic calendar.

Eventually, we gave up and accepted their presence in our home. We became one with the mice, and seeing them in our bedrooms, kitchen and den was nothing out of the ordinary.

So it turned out that being self-reliant was harder than we expected it to be. It's not easy to keep up with school, cook for yourself, keep your house rodent-free, and meet new people in a relatively new city – all at once.

Indeed, one of the greatest things about a new city is the opportunity to meet new people. Classes, bars, and sporting, musical and religious events are great places to make new friends. It's unfortunate that so many students confine themselves to their homes and refuse to expand their social scenes.

Even worse is the classic complaint voiced by a few friends of mine on a regular basis: "There aren't any girls/boys in Halifax. I should have gone to Western." I can tell you that there are plenty of great people in this large city, but like everything else, it takes effort to meet them.

In one of my past columns, I wrote about great places students can go to get a feel for this city, one they have become a part of. There are many more exciting and relatively unknown things that Halifax and the surrounding area have to offer.

Recently, I went on a spectacular camping trip with two friends to nearby Cape Split on the Bay of Fundy. It possesses some of the largest tides in the world, which you can hear thundering against the 500-foot cliff beside your campsite. The camping trip to Cape Split was a one-night adventure that started with an 8-kilometre hike to our campsite. I have never experienced a more breathtaking sunset in my entire life, and I'd recommend this trip to anyone.

Even wilder, a friend of mine recently went skydiving in Halifax and said it was the greatest feeling he has ever experienced. Obviously, this kind of adventure isn't for everyone, but it's yet another unknown Halifax gem.

There is so little that students know about this terrific city. If we open our minds to trying new things, and meeting some new people along the way, it could only benefit our university experience.

The Nazis' Jewish policy evolved over time

As we commemorate the 67th anniversary of Kristallnacht this week, historians still grapple with one of the central questions of the Holocaust: When and why did the Nazis move from a policy of random killings and forced emigration to the systematic murder of Jews? Christopher Browning, a distinguished scholar at the University of North Carolina, provides compelling answers in a first-rate study, The Origins of the Final Solution (The University of Nebraska Press). He claims that the cataclysmic shift occurred over a 30-month period from the outbreak of the war in September 1939 through March 1942. In his view, the Nazis' Jewish policy evolved from a judenfrei (Jew-free) Germany and Europe by means of expulsion to the Holocaust.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The Holocaust was not predicated on a single decision, though the Wannsee conference in January 1942 hastened its realization. "The decision-making process was prolonged and incremental," he writes. Germany's conquest of Poland, home to some three million Jews, was a decisive event in the evolution of the Holocaust. The Jewish population there was such that Germany had to devise a radical solution to its Jewish problem, as Joseph Goebbels, the propaganda minister, declared after visiting the Lodz ghetto.

At the outset, the Nazis were content with hit-and-run atrocities. These were carried out by three different groups: the Waffen-SS, the Einsatzgruppen (mobile killing units), and vigilante bands of ethnic Germans.

As Browning delves deeper, he discusses the role of the German army, the Wehrmacht, in the events leading up to the Holocaust. The army's top brass knew what lay in store for Jews (and Polish elites). But soldiers in the field, including generals, who had not been privy to this information expressed shock after witnessing atrocities. He cites the case of a high-ranking officer named Helmuth Stieff who, in a letter to his wife, wrote, "I am ashamed to be a German." On balance, the army not only tolerated ethnic cleansing, but was an outright participant in the crusade against the "Jewish Bolshevik" enemy. According to Browning, Germany's victory over France in 1940 completed the transformation of such attitudes in the Wehrmacht.

Browning's analysis of the still-born Madagascar plan is informative. France's imminent defeat prompted certain Nazi officials in the foreign ministry, notably the director of its Jewish desk, Franz Rademacher, to recommend resettling hundreds of thousands of Jews on this tropical French island off the coast of Africa in the Indian Ocean. Hitler supported the idea, but Germany's failure to subdue Britain ultimately shelved it. Still, as Browning notes, the ill-fated Madagascar plan was "an important psychological step on the road to the Final Solution."

The resettlement of Jews in sealed ghettos, especially in Poland, was of crucial importance as well, since it enabled the Nazis to concentrate Jews in small, confined spaces. The first major ghetto was in Lodz, where Jews comprised one-third of the population before the war. By January 1940, the Lodz ghetto was home to 219,000 Jews. Ghettoization, based on the Lodz model, spread to Warsaw, Krakow, Radom and Lublin.

Nazi "pragmatists" concerned with maximizing the economic potential of the ghettos won a victory by using Jewish labour to produce all manner of goods, some relatively vital to the German war effort. But in the end, the Jews were eminently dispensable.

The Nazis' ruthless exploitation of Jewish manpower, combined with a totally inadequate food supply, terrible overcrowding in sub-standard housing and utterly inadequate sanitation and medical care, transformed Polish Jews into what Browing describes as "a starving, disease-ridden, impoverished community." Their degraded status dovetailed with Nazi anti-Semitic stereotypes.

It soon became evident to the Nazis that they could not starve Jews and exploit their labour. They resolved the dilemma by liquidating the ghettos and deporting their inhabitants to death camps. Hans Frank, the German overseer of Nazi-occupied Poland, said in December 1941: "We must put an end to the Jews, that I want to say quite openly. The fuhrer (Hitler) once spoke these words… Thus vis-a-vis the Jews, I will in principle proceed only on the assumption that they will disappear. They must go…"

Adolf Hitler made this abundantly clear in a conversation with the grand mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini, in Berlin: "Germany's objective would be solely the destruction of the Jewish element residing in the Arab sphere."

Hans Frank

Browning, previously best known for Ordinary Men: Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland, maintains that Hitler's role in the Holocaust was absolutely pivotal."His obsession with the Jewish question ensured that the Nazi commitment would not slacken." Browning adds: "Hitler's anti-Semitism was both obsessive and central to his political outlook. For him the 'Jewish question' was the key to all other problems and hence the ultimate problem."

He suggests that while prominent Nazis took their cue from Hitler, the German bureaucrats who actually implemented the Holocaust did so cynically in the interests of careerism, opportunism and accommodation.

In common with most specialists on the Holocaust, Browning subscribes to the theory that the June 1941 German invasion of the Soviet Union – Operation Barbarossa – had an intensely radicalizing effect on Germany's Jewish policy. As he puts it, "The time was ripe to break the vicious cycle, to ensure that further gains in territory did not mean an increasing burden of Jews. Murder was in the air as the Germans prepared for a … 'war of destruction' against the Soviet Union, and in these circumstances Soviet Jews could hardly be spared the fate awaiting so many others."

From almost the moment it invaded the Soviet Union, Germany adopted a policy of terror, whether in Zhitomir or Kharkov. In countries such as Lithuania and Latvia, local collaborators stepped forward to help the Germans annihilate Jews. And in a few cases, pogroms erupted even before the arrival of German troops.

The staggering task of murdering so many Jews by firing squad presented logistical and psychological problems. As a result, the Nazis devised more efficient, detached and secret methods to eliminate Jews. The gas van seemed like a solution, but it was found wanting. And so the death camp emerged.

"By the end of October 1941, the conception of the Final Solution had taken shape," Browning observes. In a reference to camps such as Auschwitz and Treblinka, he writes, "The Jews of Europe were to be deported to secret camps designed to perpetrate mass murder … This program could not get fully underway until the spring of 1942."

The persecution, demonization, segregation and exploitation of Jews passed through several phases in Germany. Anti-Semitic laws, edicts, prohibitions and regulations paved the way for Kristallnacht in November 1938. The Nazis permitted so-called "Jew houses," but ruled out mass ghettoization on German soil. Germany initially encouraged emigration, but eventually stopped it, thereby sealing the fate of German Jewry.

Quoting experts such as Ian Kershaw and David Bankier, Browning claims that the majority of Germans did not consider Hitler's anti-Semitic policies an urgent priority. But due to apathy and indifference, most Germans accepted the persecution of German Jews.

By the close of 1941, European Jews in Nazi-occupied zones were doomed. As Browning writes: "The vision of the Final Solution – a program aimed at murdering every last Jew in the German grasp – had crystallized in the minds of the Nazi leadership and was henceforth being turned into a reality."

Diary of despair

Theresienstadt, liberated 60 years ago, holds bitter memories for Prague-born Toronto Holocaust survivor Vera Schiff. Her parents, sister and grandmother perished in this "model" concentration camp, the hapless victims of hunger and unimaginable hardship. Elsa Katz, her beloved mother, kept a diary of her incarceration from 1942 onward, using it as an outlet for her inconsolable sorrow. Schiff, having found it among her mother's meagre possessions after her death in 1944, has translated it into English and added explanatory notes and pre-war family photographs. A Theresienstadt Diary, which is self-published, is a moving work. "It offers a unique insight of the day-to-day heartbreak of a middle-aged woman who desperately tried… to survive," Schiff observes. In a typical passage, Katz writes, "It is a year since we were deported to this terrible place of our confinement, where we suffer terribly the life of hunger, deprivation, persecution, all this aggravated by a multitude of illnesses." Students of the Holocaust, in particular, will be interested in this vivid diary.

Jewish hospital survived in the heart of Nazi Berlin

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's hard to believe that in the middle of Berlin, capital of Hitler's "1,000-year Reich," a Jewish hospital, staffed by Jews and serving Jewish patients, could survive right to the end of the war.

Yet Washington lawyer Daniel Silver has written a book contending just that. Silver, author of Refuge in Hell: How Berlin's Jewish Hospital Outlasted the Nazis, told the remarkable story of the hospital to a sometimes skeptical audience, at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Holocaust Education Week

In Silver's telling of the story, a small pocket of Berlin Jews rode out the war in the heart of the Nazi empire, with some residing in relatively comfortable quarters in the hospital. While other Berliners suffered from lack of running water and heat, the hospital was fully functional, since three of the hospital's seven buildings had been commandeered as an army hospital and the facility shared the same heating and water plant. Despite those circumstances, the Jews working in the hospital and others residing in Berlin lived with the possibility of "resettlement in the east" on more than one occasion. Throughout the war, top Nazis like Adolf Eichmann would demand that the hospital administrator select Jews who would be sent to their deaths in Auschwitz.

The Jews survived the war not because of the Nazis' benevolence but because of their unique status and due to bureaucratic infighting among top German officials, Silver said.

The hospital, which covered an entire city block and consisted of seven buildings, was part of the Jewish communal infrastructure that was built by moneys taxed from Jews and was aimed at serving the prewar Jewish population. The hospital dates back to the 1750s, he said.

After the Nazis took power in 1933 and enacted anti-Semitic legislation, the hospital was starved for funds and was close to bankruptcy. It became busy again on Kristallnacht, the Nazi pogrom in November 1938 that signalled the beginning of the end for European Jews.

From then until 1942, "the hospital was busier than ever" as other Jewish institutions in Germany were shut down and Jews from across the country came to Berlin for treatment. The hospital for the first time opened a psychiatric ward and an orphanage and provided medical care for the 70,000 Jews who still lived in Berlin as of December 1941.

While many Jews were being deported to their deaths – including hospital staff – a significant number remained in Berlin to serve as slave labourers in the German armaments industry. The hospital helped keep these essential workers healthy enough for their jobs, Silver said.

To prove to Jews that the relocation east was benign, the hospital's doctors attended the deportees on their voyage and its commissary even provided sandwich meals for the trip. The hospital performed a useful function for the Nazis, Silver said.

Albert Speer, Germany's armaments minister, considered Jewish slave labourers key to continued munitions productivity, while for the rest of Germany's senior officials, they were "an intense embarrassment." Particularly so for propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels, who in 1943 declared the city free of Jews.

The Nazis' internal debate on what to do with the Jews was resolved by Hitler who ordered them removed. In February 1943 the SS conducted a series of raids, with storm troopers grabbing Jews from their places of work and herding them to improvised transit camps. Among them were 5,000 to 6,000 Jews who were married to gentile women, and their children, who were considered "mongrels" in the Nazi racial classification system, Silver said.

The arrest of these Jews prompted public protests from their wives and mothers, who gathered for seven days on Rosenstrasse street outside a Jewish community centre and who publicly shouted, "Murderers, murderers, give us back our children." Around the same time, Germany suffered its massive defeat at Stalingrad and Berlin was subjected to a punishing British air raid, Silver said.

Hitler, who "was extremely sensitive to public opinion" from his Aryan supporters, deferred the Jews' deportations until war news improved, Silver added. It never did.

The hospital remained open to serve this reduced Jewish population. The efforts of Walter Lustig, the Nazi-appointed hospital administrator, and of Eichmann, kept the facility functioning to war's end, Silver said.

Lustig was faced with numerous Nazi demands that he prepare lists of people for deportation. He did so, witnesses recounted, with tears in his eyes and the explanation that if he didn't, the hospital would be closed and all the Jews killed, Silver stated, while acknowledging others criticize Lustig as a collaborator.

Eichmann, for his part, was involved in intense bureaucratic infighting over the hospital. On March 10, 1943, the Gestapo surrounded the hospital and told Lustig he had two hours to prepare everyone for deportation.

Anti-Semitic material found at three GTA universities

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Police and security at all three Toronto universities are investigating after anti-Semitic pamphlets titled "Jewish Supremacism Unmasked" were found tucked into books in the schools' libraries last week.

While no person or group has taken responsibility for the pamphlets, which appeared at York University, Ryerson University and all three campuses of the University of Toronto, Hillel of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress have pointed the finger at white supremacist groups in the United States.

"The pamphlets contain messages that are a combination of classic anti-Semitic references and also hostile anti-Israel references," said Tilly Shames, Israel affairs director for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

The pamphlets were discovered in Ryerson's library on Oct. 31. The next day, about 600 pamphlets were found at York, and hundreds more turned up at U of T, said Steve Shulman, director of CJC Ontario region.

The pamphlet focuses on a purported Jewish conspiracy in the United States and makes "by-the-way references to Canada," Shulman said.

It also refers readers to American white supremacists websites, suggesting that the material came from an American source, he said.

"In terms of hate material, it features age-old views," Shulman said.

The pamphlet makes references to modern-day Israel, as well as to ideas posited by Martin Luther.

"It focuses on the usual arguments, like the Jewish conspiracy to run the world," Shulman said.

"In my opinion, this didn't come from an [on-campus] student group. I would be surprised if this came from a student," Shames said.

She said that as soon as campus security discovered the pamphlets, police, Canadian Jewish Congress and Hillel were notified, and the universities have been communicating with them.

All three schools released statements that condemned the material and pledged to investigate.

"We hope no member of our U of T community would stoop so low as to distribute anti-Semitic literature, but if that is the case, we will take swift and appropriate action," said David Farrar, U of T's deputy provost.

Ryerson called the pamphlets "unacceptable" and said it "takes this issue extremely seriously and will investigate to the fullest extent possible."

Rob Tiffin, York University's vice-president of students, said that "the person or persons who distributed this offensive material on our campus… are not welcome here at York University. This type of harmful propaganda is contrary to fundamental Canadian values."

On his website, David Duke, an American White supremacist and former Ku Klux Klan leader, posted a response to Canadian news articles and statements that have called the pamphlets' distribution a hate crime.

Shames said that while the pamphlet in its entirety could not be found on Duke's website, excerpts could.

Duke's website also posted an open letter to U of T that targets CJC, calling it a "Jewish Supremacist organization."

The letter writer says,"I and a small group of my fellow students have dared to distribute a little piece of paper that dares to expose Jewish supremacism."

The writer goes on to ask, "Why is it called hatred to expose the fact that Jews in Israel have stolen huge swaths of Palestinian land and oppressed, tortured and murdered thousands of Palestinians in the occupied territories?"

In a section that talks about Jewish neo-conservatives in the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush, the letter asks, "Why is it called hatred to tell the obvious truth that the Iraq War is a war conceived and driven by Jewish supremacists – a war for Israel?"

The letter is signed by "Freedomus, a student who dares not reveal his name to the inquisitors."

Although hundreds of the pamphlets were found at all three universities and turned over to police, Shames is confident the perpetrators weren't successful.

"A majority of the students have not seen the pamphlets because the campuses have dealt with this so well. The people who are responsible for this were not successful in reaching out to as many students as they wanted to," she said.

"As an organization, we are very pleased with the way the campuses and security have handled the matter," Shames added.

"Whether this could be the work of one person, we don't know. We don't want to be overly alarmist, but we need to find the perpetrators so students can feel safe on campus," Shulman said.

Orthodox Judaism must be accessible to all: rabbi

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

To thrive in the 21st century, Orthodox Judaism needs to be accessible to all Jews and the Torah should lead people to make moral decisions independently, says a leading authority on modern orthodoxy.

"God did not create us Orthodox Jews to be automatons," said Rabbi Saul Rabbi Berman, speaking before a large audience gathered recently at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue to attend the fourth annual Torah in Motion conference.

"It is our responsibility to make individual... moral decisions in our own lives and to understand what the underlying values [of these decisions] are."

Lecturing on the topic "A Fearless Orthodoxy for the 21st Century," Rabbi Berman lauded the accomplishments of world Jewry in the years since the Holocaust, but attributed the prime motivator for many of these feats to fear.

"Cumulatively, as a people, we have achieved extraordinary things, but most of these [accomplishments] were driven by fear," Rabbi Berman said.

"A fear of physical vulnerability, a fear that the world would forget the genocide of the Jews."

This fear, according to the rabbi, has not helped Jews solve major problems in the community, such as poverty and the widening gap between secular and Orthodox Jews.

As such, to move forward in the present century, Rabbi Berman called for Jews of all political and religious stripes to value and love one another's differences.

"We need to love and value other Jews, to pass from an approach of fear, to an approach of love," he said.

Rabbi Berman also trumpeted a new way to manifest the love of Torah, one that emphasizes understanding.

"We are not entitled to say just tell me what to do," he said.

"To achieve values requires that we have sensitive awareness of what these values are that we're supposed to achieve."

Ultimately, God wants Jews to be a partner in bringing the values of the Torah to life, he said.

"God wants us as his partner in the continuing unfolding of the betterment of the world.

"The future grandeur of Orthodoxy is an Orthodoxy that is accessible to all Jews and has the capacity to inform the world with Jewish values, where halachic solutions [are applied] to human problems."

Currently director of Edah, an organization that focuses on invigorating modern Orthodox ideology and religious life, Rabbi Berman is also a noted scholar, educator and proponent of civil rights.

He demonstrated in support of black civil rights at Selma, Ala., in 1965 and was jailed twice for such advocacy.

In addition to holding such posts as rabbi at Congregation Beth Israel in Berkeley, Calif., and senior rabbi at Lincoln Square Synagogue in Manhattan, Rabbi Berman has also been a professor at Columbia University Law School and Stern College.

He is perhaps best known for spearheading Jewish education programs for women.

Lost in Hollywood

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

During a sightseeing visit to Los Angeles some years ago, I surprised myself by taking a cab one afternoon to the Margaret Herrick Library at the Fairbanks Center for Motion Picture Study in Beverly Hills. I hadn't seen the Getty Museum, the Hollywood studios and so many other sights, so why was I going to some musty library? Blame it on the thrill of the genealogical chase.

The purpose of my visit was to trace a missing branch of my family. My father's aunt and uncle, Abe and Ethel (nee Alexander) Harris had moved from Toronto to Los Angeles in the late '20s or early '30s. How proud they must have been when, within a few years, one of their two sons became a successful child actor.

Larry Harris was no Jackie Koogan, to be sure, but his career certainly impressed his cousins in Toronto. After working as a cinematic double for well-known child star Bobby Breen from Toronto, Larry became an occasional player in the popular children's series Our Gang, also known as The Little Rascals. He also acted in a few feature films of the '30s and '40s, apparently including one with James Stewart.

Over the decades, there were letters and visits between the two family branches, but eventually contact was lost. What happened to our California cousins? As a genealogical gumshoe working on the Alexander family tree, I hoped my visit to the library would turn up some important clues.

Situated in an elegant and historic Spanish-Romanesque building and funded by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, the Margaret Herrick Library is probably the most extensive motion picture library in the world.

It holds more than 27,000 books, 1,800 periodical titles, 25,000 posters, 60,000 screenplays, 200,000 clipping files, seven million photographs and many special collections. The affiliated Academy Film Archives offers a collection of 12,000 historic films. There had to be some trace of Larry Harris amidst such vast holdings, I reasoned, as I stepped through the Bob Hope Lobby past the Karl Malden Conference Room to the Cecil B. DeMille Reading Room.

As a rule, genealogical searches take twice as long and produce only a fraction of the results that one expects. Even so, I was not disappointed. Chasing down many periodical references led to a couple of pertinent items, while a hardcover book about The Little Rascals yielded a good photographic still.

Ultimately, nothing I found in the library got me past the '40s. It was the United States Social Security death index, accessible for free over the Internet, that helped me pinpoint the family's whereabouts in the 1980s. They lived in Riverside, Calif. The search for living descendants continues.

It's well known that the Jews "invented" Hollywood and that a wealth of Jewish actors, writers, directors and performers worked in the film industry. The Margaret Herrick Library is an ideal place for genealogists to seek information on relatives who were part of the Hollywood film industry and seemed to vanish somewhere in the Hollywood Hills.

Of course, a treat awaits library visitors with a special affinity for the movies. It's only too easy to get distracted by books, periodicals and ephemera on Birth of a Nation, The Wizard of Oz, Gone With the Wind, or your favourite film by Alfred Hitchcock, Preston Sturges or Quentin Tarantino.

The library is at at 333 La Cienega Blvd. Researchers can conduct library searches through its website, www.mhlcardcat.org. Librarians will also endeavour to answer brief factual queries by e-mail, while private researchers are available to conduct more in-depth research for a fee.

Smiling at the back of the bus

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

On Oct. 24, Rosa Parks passed away. This iconic figure will live on, not just in history books, but also in the lives of the tens of millions of people whom she affected. Her one small act redirected the course of society forever – not black society, not American society, but truly the society of the entire world.

After putting in a long workday as a seamstress, Parks rode the bus home. In the South, racial discrimination was such that blacks not only had to sit in the back of public buses but also suffered still further indignity: if a white person needed a seat, any black passenger already occupying that seat or the one next to it was to vacate it and ride standing, so that no white passenger need suffer by sitting next to a black.

On that day, this was exactly what happened. The driver of the bus instructed four blacks who were sitting to leave their seats for the one white man who wished to sit down. Three black women immediately complied; Parks did not.

Police were called, she was arrested for her crime and convicted. A fine would also follow. Much more consequential was that this one simple, single act of human dignity and defiance in the face of injustice was the catalyst for the entire Civil Rights Movement to be born.

Immediately, the entire black population of Montgomery, Ala., boycotted city buses. The boycott lasted 13 months and brought the public transit system to a screeching and grinding halt – and to financial ruin.

The spark that ignited this sentiment of enough is enough now spread without control. Race relations would never again be the same. The rest, as we say, is history.

In every society, opportunities exist for healing what is clearly wrong. This is part of God's plan in the advancement of the world – tikkun olam, repairing the world.

In reading of Parks' death and her noble contribution toward tikkun olam, I ask myself what injustice or affront to human dignity exists today that we have become so accustomed to, so accepting of, that we just keep living and smiling right along as we, too, sit riding at the back of the bus. Where today is our "back of the bus"?

The indignity that the Jews of Ontario suffer is so blatant that we as a community choose to deal with it by not dealing with it – but the balm and bliss of denial are very temporary in nature. Reality will confront us even if we don't wish to confront it.

Our government's refusal to fund some religious education while happily funding other religious education is our back of the bus. Indeed, it is not even fully analogous to the blacks being told to sit at the back of the bus. We Jews are told we may not even ride on the bus at all. Not only may we not ride on this bus, but we are told to pay the fares for others to ride it. At the same time as our government refuses to fund our schools, it forces us to fund the religious education of others.

The equation of annually increasing tuition for Jewish education and yearly decreasing student enrolment in Jewish schools is at best equal to communal failure, at worst to the destruction of the community as we know it.

The situation is unfair, discriminatory and in violation of the Charter of Rights. It is intolerable; yet we tolerate it. Indeed we regularly remit our tax roll.

Hmm… Perhaps not! Where is our Rosa Parks?

Jewish Life

A heartbreaking story

The Year Of Magical Thinking* by Joan Didion, Random House of Canada.

Books
Bernard Baskin

That life is not fair is a powerful declaration that we are reluctant to accept. The deepest impulses of the heart demand fairness, but the world has different plans. Each day noble people die young, wicked people prosper, pestilence sweeps innocent populations, and the world spins on indifferent to the anguish that blankets so much of the globe.

Life has not been fair to Joan Didion, a widely acclaimed and prolific author. One day in December 2003, her husband of 40 years, the novelist John Gregory Dunne, sat down to dinner in their Manhattan apartment. Suddenly he slumped over and fell to the floor. Later that evening he was pronounced dead of a massive heart attack.

This occurred at the same time that her 39-year-old daughter, Quintana, was a patient at a New York City hospital, hooked up to a respirator, her life in jeopardy.

This book was written while beloved Quintana was still alive. The reader reacts as to a powerful body blow to learn from other sources that she died a year and a half after the death of her father.

Of her husband's death, the author writes, "We both worked at home... I could not count the times during the average day when something would come up that I needed to tell him. This impulse did not end with his death. What ended was the possibility of response. I read something in the paper that I would normally have read to him. I notice some change in the neighbourhood that would interest him... I am dropping my keys on the table inside the door before I fully remember. There is no one to hear this news. Nowhere to go with the unmade plan, the uncompleted thought. There is no one to agree or disagree."

In The Year of Magical Thinking, Didion writes how she tried to come to terms with the inexplicable, how to face a year that "cut loose any fixed idea I had ever had about death, about illness, about probability and luck, about good fortune and bad, about marriage and children and memory, about grief, about the ways in which people do and do not deal with the fact that life ends, about the shallowness of sanity, about life itself."

By the term "magical thinking" the author refers to the ruses of self-deception through which the bereaved seek to shield themselves from grief. She was reluctant to donate her dead husband's clothing or to dispose of his shoes because it would mean acknowledging his final departure.

Didion becomes aware that even her sophisticated friends in New York and California, who believed absolutely in their own management skills, were impotent when death called. "They believed absolutely in the power of telephone numbers they had at their fingertips, the right doctor, the major donor, the person who could facilitate a favour at State or Justice." But she knew that some events would be beyond her control. "This is one of those events."

This is a sad, wise, honest – even sometimes wry and humorous – account, a heartbreaking story filled with stirring detail. The question it raises is universal – how are we to make sense of the world's cruelty and callous indifference as we strive to find new meaning and purpose in life?

Yitzhak Rabin's 10th yahrzeit

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The 12th of Cheshvan (Nov. 14 this year) marks the 10th yahrzeit of Israel's Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Rabin's assassination in 1995 stunned the world and caused an immediate outpouring of grief. The pain may not be as raw a decade later, but Internet sites can help us recall the loss and the legacy.

On that day, Rabin was addressing a massive peace demonstration at Tel Aviv City Hall plaza (renamed Rabin Square). The Ariga site has reproduced his speech in its entirety. Rabin concluded, "This rally must send a message to the Israeli people, to the Jewish people around the world, to the many people in the Arab world, and indeed to the entire world, that the Israeli people want peace, support peace. For this, I thank you." [www.ariga.com/rabin-speech.shtml]

To get a good sense of the shock felt around the world, read the original reports from CNN in its large section on the assassination and funeral. [http://tinyurl.com/cml8z] One of the articles at the USA Today site focuses on the reaction from younger people, including a poem from a third grader from Haifa. [www.usatoday.com/news/index/nrabin00.htm]

One year before he was assassinated, Rabin was on the world stage when he was co-awarded the 1994 Nobel Peace Prize. Rabin delivered an eloquent lecture that traced his road from soldier to politician to peacemaker. He remembered how he was first handed a rifle to defend himself at "the tender age of 16 ... when most youngsters are struggling to unravel the secrets of mathematics and the mysteries of the Bible." In his years as a military man, he "issued orders for dozens, probably hundreds of military operations," and was determined to bring peace to his land. "There is only one radical means of sanctifying human lives," Rabin said at the ceremonies in Oslo. "Not armoured plating, or tanks, or planes, or concrete fortifications. The one radical solution is peace." [http://tinyurl.com/d36rw]

Excerpts from the hundreds of messages in the Knesset's online guestbook in memory of Rabin can be found at www.knesset.gov.il/rabin/rabin.htm. Messages can still be added.

• We will always remember you dear friend. May Israel bloom and live in peace for your memory. – Cecilia Keuffer

• Rabin was a great man, a fighter for peace. Words do this great man no justice. – Jon Morris

• Yitzhak, I am 12 today but when you were murdered, I was 4. I want to thank you so much for what you did for our tiny, beautiful country. Thank you with much love and respect. – Hadar Tal

"Collection of Rabbinic Statements" has more than a dozen essays from rabbis who may not have agreed with Rabin's politics but were repulsed by Yigal Amir and his actions. Rav Shlomo Aviner of Rosh Yeshivat Ateret Cohanim wrote, "It is a black day for Israel – perhaps the blackest since the founding of our state – a terrible sin has been committed. One Jew has been murdered by another in the Land of Israel and allegedly 'for the sake of' the Land of Israel..."

In his essay "Was Rabin's Assassin an Observant Jew?" Rabbi Shmuel Boteach said "while Yigal Amir may once have been an observant Jew, pulling the trigger of his handgun changed all that." [http://mail-jewish.org/rabin.html]

The Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs has created a comprehensive English language site that includes a biography, reports by the commission of inquiry into the murder and eulogies from world leaders including Jordan's late King Hussein, former UN secretary general Boutros Boutros-Ghali and former U.S. president Bill Clinton. Although Clinton's "Shalom Haver" eulogy was extremely moving, the most heartbreaking words at Rabin's funeral came from his granddaughter, Noa Ben-Artzi Filosof. [http://tinyurl.com/dfs24]

"People greater than I have already eulogized you, but none of them was fortunate like myself to feel the caress of your warm, soft hands and the warm embrace that was just for us, or your half-smiles, which will always say so much, the same smile that is no more, and froze with you. I have no feelings of revenge because my pain and loss are so big, too big... To the angels of heaven that are accompanying you now, I ask that they watch over you, that they guard you well, because you deserve such a guard. We will love you grandfather, always."

The homework club is a volunteer program that provides students in the Somali community from age six and up with homework support and coaching. Seen with some donated supplies, from left, are Talia Shiff, Dylan Tittle, Matthew Goodman, Dahlia Snaiderman, Daniel Gibson and Joseph Rootman.

The Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman
Fall 2005 Lecture Series at Holy Blossom Temple presents

Democratization: Is It For Real?

Democratization of previously undemocratic or tyrannical societies is an idea in the air and an emerging reality in places on the ground. For some, this phenomenon is revolutionary and important; for others, democratization is American hubris at its worst. This series, featuring some of the most compelling voices of our time, examines this explosive and significant issue.

Junebug

Joseph, left, and Wolf Lebovic examine plans for JNF's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Reservoir in Lachish, Israel.

Negev Dinner honours mega-developers

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For the first time in more than half a century, two brothers will be the honorees at the Jewish National Fund's annual Negev Dinner in Toronto.

Philanthropists and Holocaust survivors Joseph (Joe) and Wolf (Wilf) Lebovic, who built one of the Toronto area's largest land development and building corporations, will be feted for their communal leadership and dedication to Israel on Sunday, Nov. 27, at the Sheraton Centre.

They've earmarked the proceeds from this year's Negev Dinner campaign to a major reservoir in the northern Negev to be known as the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Reservoir at Lachish.

"This reservoir will help sustain the surrounding farmers and agricultural settlements in the area by providing at least a two-fold increase in agricultural output, particularly in the growth of grapes," said Ron Hoffman, president of JNF Toronto.

The Lebovics have pledged $1 million to launch the project.

The brothers' charitable giving, in the tens of millions of dollars, has benefited hospitals and institutions both here and in Israel.

The story of their escape from the ashes of the Holocaust to become immigrants and entrepreneurs in Canada, as well as their pace-setting generosity, is material for the movies.

Born in Czechoslovakia before World Wa II, Joseph, Wolf and their sister Lily grew up in the small shtetl-like town of Brustura, where their parents Harry and Rosa settled.

Their father, who acted as mayor, established a successful sawmill in the town.

The Yiddish-speaking family lived an idyllic life, and the children studied Czech, Ukrainian, Hebrew and religious studies. Joseph and Wolf also played soccer and were avid chess players.

When the children were in high school, the family moved to Budapest, where Harry Lebovic worked in the lumber trade. In Budapest, the boys expanded their knowledge of languages, adding Hungarian, German and Latin.

After the Nazis occupied Budapest in 1944, the Lebovic family and the rest of the city's Jews were herded into a ghetto, where they were severely persecuted.

Joseph recalls, "When we escaped the ghetto, we were frequently separated and we survived by assuming false identities as gentiles."

He added: "We and other Jews cheated death through trading jewelry and money to corrupt officers for temporary freedom. Our family survived, but out of about 100 cousins, only four survived."

Lebovics liberated by Russian army in 1945

After their liberation by the Russian army in 1945, despite their horrific experiences, Joseph and Wolf returned to their academic and religious studies, and became immersed in cultural and sports activities in Hungary.

When the Iron Curtain descended, the family left for England, where Joseph entered Yeshiva Etz Chaim and studied in university, and Wolf studied theology and later went into the fur trade.

In 1949, the family came to Canada. Joseph joined his father in the small northern Ontario town of Mattawa, where they operated a sawmill. Wolf worked in the fur trade in Montreal and later in Toronto.

The family eventually owned three successful sawmills, and later moved to Toronto, where they started a wholesale lumber business that expanded into retail.

When the Lebovics realized that the builders they were selling their products to were prospering, they gave up the lumber business and established Lebovic Enterprises in 1953.

With Wolf overseeing construction and sales and Joseph as land developer and the public face of the company, they plunged into land development and construction.

They began with single family homes, then expanded to high-rise, commercial and industrial buildings as their interests grew northward and eastward from their initial base in Scarborough.

Asked about the company's phenomenal growth, Joseph said, "Along with luck, we had innovative ideas."

But they also had a knack for business, he said.

"There are certain feelings people have such as touch and feel. We have extra sensitivity to good deals. The way some people have talent for music or art, we have a good sense to recognize good deals. I think that this is a talent – you can't learn talent."

He added that people recognized this talent and invested in the Lebovics.

"They gave us the ability to have resources and to go into projects, and we made a lot of money for some people."

Joseph believes that "my success can also be attributed to my yeshiva studies, [which gave me an affinity for] logical thinking and avoiding tunnel vision."

Along with their business success came a philosophy of helping those in need, both here and in Israel.

"I believe very strongly that we Jews, all over the world, need Israel and Israel needs us," Wolf said. He added that since the State of Israel was founded in 1948, "Jews have respect… Israel has even more meaning to us because we were persecuted."

At home, with the establishment of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Charitable Foundation, the brothers have become the largest donors to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. They've also established a chair in Jewish studies at the University of Waterloo, and they support the United Jewish Appeal, State of Israel Bonds, Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem, the Weizmann Institute and Hebrew University, among other beneficiaries.

The Lebovics have also contributed $20 million to UJA Federation's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Community Centre project, now being built in Vaughan.

In addition to their philanthropy, the brothers also devote time to voluntary activities.

Joseph has served as president of the Ontario and the Canadian Urban Development Institutes, and he was founder and chairman of the Stouffville Cultural Foundation and a member of the East Metro Youth Association.

He also served on the board of the Scarborough Centenary Hospital for 20 years, as well as on the Scarborough Board of Health and the board of Scarborough General Hospital.

You could say the Lebovics are beyond busy. Yet, Joseph regularly attends services at Congregation Anshei Minsk and pilots his own twin-engine plane. He is also an enthusiastic sailor, an avid tennis player, and he travels extensively.

Wolf is a sports fan and wine connoisseur, and has won many international bridge tournaments. He is the father of six children and 15 grandchildren.

Centre for interfaith dialogue to be launched in Feldman's name

At one Toronto synagogue, Mike Feldman's name will tout virtues for which the city has become famous: tolerance and respect for others.

On Nov. 17, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue will honour Toronto's deputy mayor and North York political fixture with its second annual "Yakir Hakahal" (Precious to the Community) Award.

More than 600 people are expected to attend the dinner, to take place at the Terrace Banquet Centre (1680 Creditstone Rd., Vaughan).

Keynote speaker will be former Ontario premier Bob Rae. Dignitaries expected to attend include Toronto Mayor David Miller, Ken Dryden, minister of social development; Monte Kwinter, Ontario's minister of community safety; Senator Art Eggleton, Ontario Conservative leader John Tory, and various municipal officials.

Proceeds from the event will go toward establishing the Mike and Sue Feldman Centre for Toronto Community Dialogue, intended to promote good relations among religious and ethnic groups in the city.

To be located at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, the centre will serve as a resource for improving interfaith relations, something Feldman says he and the city he serves have long championed.

"I've always believed that Toronto is blessed," Feldman told The CJN. "We believe in nothing more lethal than dialogue. And I've always believed that if I have a problem with a person, it's with the person and not a whole people.

"I've always concentrated on understanding. I want to enjoy another person's culture, their music, their food. I think Toronto does that so well."

The dinner will feature a video of a choir comprised of Jewish, Catholic and Muslim children. A musical program featuring that choir will take place at Beth Emeth Jan. 29, 2006.

Feldman became a founding member of the synagogue in 1958. He served as the shul's president from 1968 to 1970.

Mike Feldman

He's also a past president of the Ontario region of United Synagogues of America and was national president of Canadian Friends of Haifa University.

In addition to being Toronto's deputy mayor, Feldman is councillor for Ward 10 (York Centre) and serves on several municipal committees, including the Toronto Parking Authority, the Roundtable on Seniors, and the North York Community Council.

Feldman began his civic involvement as chair of the Committee of Adjustment and the Planning Board in the former City of North York. He was alderman in 1985 in the city's Ward 10 where he was responsible for the rejuvenation and redevelopment of Sheppard West, the Antibes Community Centre, and Earl Bales and Irving Chapley parks.

He's also been viewed as a guru on social housing in Toronto. He chaired the Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., which under his watch added almost 20,000 affordable housing units to its supply, many going to the elderly.

Feldman has also served on a number of housing task forces, including Accommodation for the Physically and Mentally Challenged, and Shelter for Low Income Singles. He has also served on the boards of Metro Toronto Housing Authority and the Ontario Housing Corp.

In addition, he was a member of the Provincial Advisory Committee for Social Housing Reform and Metro Toronto's Home for the Aged; a board member of Branson Hospital; a director of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; and is involved with the Reena Foundation.

For more than 14 years, Feldman has chaired the annual Colitis Research Foundation fundraising dinner.

In the private sector, Feldman was founding president of Teela Data Management, specializing in real estate information. He retired in 1988 but ran again for public office in 1992.

Feldman and his wife of 55 years, Sue, have three children and four grandchildren.

Fellowship endowment to honour geriatric specialist

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Dr. Michael Gordon has had a long association with the Herzog Hospital, the third largest hospital in Jerusalem.

Herzog Hospital is known worldwide for its work treating the psychological problems experienced as a result of terror attacks and natural disasters. Two-thirds of the hospital's 340 beds are for geriatric patients.

Gordon will be honoured for his contributions in Canada and in Israel by the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital Ezrath Nashim at an upcoming concert and silent auction on Thursday, Nov. 24, at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts. The event is under the patronage of Israeli ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker.

Meir Rotenberg is the president of the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital Ezrath Nashim and concert chair is Rosalie Mednick Nepom.

The annual gala concert features violinist Moshe Hammer and Sisters of Sheynville, a swing-and-klezmer-influenced 1930s and '40s Yiddish band whose repertoire include songs that were recorded by the famous Barry Sisters.

Gordon, the vice-president of medical services at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, heads geriatric and internal medicine there. He is also head of geriatrics at Mount Sinai Hospital, a professor of medicine at the University of Toronto and a member of the Joint Centre for Bioethics at the university.

The proceeds of the tribute to Gordon will be used for the establishment of an endowment, the Dr. Michael Gordon International Fellowship, at Herzog Hospital.

"The fellowship will enable doctors from Herzog Hospital to spend considerable time at Baycrest Hospital to advance their field of studies," Nepom says.

Gordon is committed to helping Israeli physicians who want to learn about the care of elderly at Baycrest. The Israelis often have difficulty getting funding to support their training. "The fellowship will also enhance support for senior family physicians from Herzog Hospital who want geriatric training," Gordon says.

Established in 1895, Herzog Hospital has been a leading provider of psychiatric and geriatric services in the Middle East. It is also a leading research centre in geriatrics, especially research into Alzheimer's and Parkinson's diseases.

Gordon, who was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., attended medical school in Scotland and was an intern in Israel. He served in the Peace Corps in Tunisia, where he heard on Arab radio of the Six Day War in Israel.

"This had a profound impact on my attitude to Israel," he says. He returned to the United States to complete a second internship in Boston, and because of the Vietnam War, he moved to Montreal, working at the Royal Victoria Hospital.

In 1969, he went to Israel. He worked in pathology at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem for six months and served as a medical officer with the Israeli air force. Among other things, he assisted with helicopter evacuations. When he competed his regular military service, he became a medical resident at the Old Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem.

During this period, he would go, as a medical adviser, to the Old Ezrath Nashim Hospital, which was then primarily a psychiatric hospital.

In 1973, Gordon returned to Canada for postgraduate training at the University of Toronto. He worked at the Toronto General and Mount Sinai hospitals.

After two years, he decided to remain in Canada and accepted positions as an internist with an interest in aging with both Baycrest Centre and Mount Sinai Hospital.

"By the time I was offered amnesty in 1976 to return to the United States, I was enamoured by Canada and the Canadian health-care system," Gordon says. He received certification as a geriatrician and moved up to his current positions.

His connection with Herzog Hospital was renewed, Gordon says, when Dr. Mark Clarfield, a former Torontonian who moved to Israel and became head of geriatrics at Herzog, invited him to Israel to speak at Herzog Hospital.

"Since that time, I have increased my connection to Herzog, to give lectures, and we have trained a number of physicians who became staff members at Herzog Hospital," Gordon says.

"That is why I consider this tribute as a great honour."

Recently, Gordon became a featured columnist on aging for The CJN. He is a sought-after speaker whose accomplishments include participation on professional and governmental committees on aging and related subjects.

For more information on the concert and the Dr. Michael Gordon tribute, call 416-256-4222 or e-mail herzoghosp@on.aibn.com.

MEDICAL BIO-ETHICS: MEDICINE AND RELIGION

in a series of three outstanding lectures

We are increasingly confronted by the media with questions most of us are unable to answer. Our series on medical bio-ethics, led by doctors and lay people alike, may help us to find the answers we are looking for, and to assist us in making the difficult decisions we may face.

"What's New in Jewish Medical Ethics?"
Monday, November 21st, at 8 p.m.

The scope of Rabbi David Feldman's discussion will focus on an update of the Terri Schiavo case and how it pertains to the living will and end-of-life issues. He will discuss embryonic stem cell research and the ethics of transplants in science, theology and politics.

"The World of Medical Ethics"
Monday, November 28th, at 8 p.m.

Dr. Kerry Bowman is a clinical Bio-Ethicist at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto. He consults directly on ethical issues every day; his discussion will focus primarily on negotiating end of life decisions and ethical considerations. Rabbi Wayne Allen will join Dr. Bowman with a religious perspective on these difficult considerations.

"Public Health Ethics"
Monday, December 5th, at 8 p.m.

Experiences with SARS and the specter of pandemic influenza strains have raised issues of the legitimacy of public health measures to control infectious diseases. Dr. Ross Upshur, a General Practitioner associated with Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, will outline recent scholarship in public health ethics with a specific focus on applications to communicable disease control and global health equity.

The Community is invited to attend. This series is free of charge. Light Refreshments will be served.

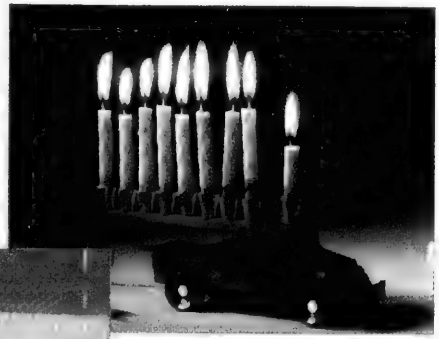
JF&CS has a bright idea for celebrating Chanukah

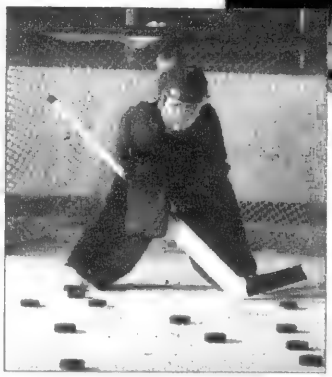
New initiative levels the playing field

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

Chanukah. Traditionally, it's a time of warmth, of glowing light in the darkness, inspired by the triumph of the few against the many. But in today's context, the many are Toronto's Jewish poor and few are the resources available to make a meaningful difference in their lives. That's why JF&CS, in collaboration with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has created Levelling the Playing Field, an innovative approach to filling the many shortfalls that prevent disadvantaged kids from accessing the same opportunities as their more fortunate peers.

Eric Kirsh, the Supervisor of Jewish Family and Child Service's Financial Assistance and Rehabilitation Program is excited about the potential Levelling the Playing Field has to help Jewish kids thrive academically and socially. "There are many things a child needs to build a better future for themselves that tend to be overlooked," Kirsh said. "Giving a child the chance to take music lessons or join a hockey team is wonderful, but if that child has no recorder to practice on at home or no skates to lace up, what's the point? Levelling the Playing Field recognizes this and aims to allocate resources to fund those items necessary to facilitate the growth, development and success of Jewish kids living in poverty."





In its first year, the program plans to raise funds for computers and software, sports equipment, extra-curricular lessons and special event clothing. "Levelling the Playing Field depends on community support and that means our kids depend on each of us," Kirsh noted.

Jewish Family and Child Service is grateful for the many ways its supporters have annually included agency kids in their Chanukah plans and gift-giving. "Each year, without any prompting, generous individuals and groups collect toys for our foster kids and invite the children of our clients to community Chanukah parties," said Karen Paikin, Manager of Communications for JF&CS. "A few years ago, out of just such concern, our enormously successful, annual Drive for Dreidels came to be. We're looking forward to this year's Drive - a program aimed at ensuring no Jewish child in the GTA is without a new toy for Chanukah."

A tall order for sure, and much appreciated by the recipients as well as JF&CS, on their behalf. But, as Paikin continued, "the reality of Jewish poverty is an all-season problem and, as a community, we have to create and adopt a year-round, long-term solution. Levelling the Playing Field is an important step in that direction."

With a record 3000 Jewish children living below the poverty line in the Toronto area, the need for help has never been more urgent. Assisting Toronto's Jewish poor and vulnerable is a key commitment of UJA Federation Campaign 2006, now underway.

If you would like to know more about Levelling the Playing Field and how to invest in lighting the way for an impoverished Jewish child, call JF&CS 416 638-7800, ext 259.

Jewish Family & Child Service set to launch expanded website

Jewish Family and Child Service fills a unique role in Jewish Toronto, as the community's coordinating social service agency and family counselling resource.

Now, according to David Peltz, President of the JF&CS Board of Directors "with the coming launch of www.jfandcs.com, accessing the full range of Jewish Family and Child Service support will be easier than ever before." He explained that the newly redesigned website will facilitate everything from online registration for JF&CS workshops and programs to making a simple and secure donation. "For a service-focussed organization that's as diverse and far-reaching as ours," Peltz said, "it's essential to provide our clients with current, comprehensive information about every way we can assist them. "

Jewish Family and Child Service's growing roster of programs and services touches Toronto's 180,000- member Jewish population at every age and stage of their lives and development. From pre-school programs at the Family Resource Centre in York Region to a downtown Homework Club for inner city teens, from Chaplaincy Services to hospice care, from foster families to dealing with Woman Abuse, from the work of the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre to outreach to immigrants, JF&CS is the human services hub that drives our community's well-being.

The new website will have added advantages for potential supporters, giving them timely and detailed information about the range of ways they can support JF&CS. Bev Margolian, JF&CS Friends Campaign Chair echoed the sentiments of Anne Frank, who reminded us that "nobody need wait a single moment before starting to improve the world." "At JF&CS, we believe that nobody should have to wait a single moment for the help they need to live in dignity," said Margolian.

The website will be up and running later in November and Jewish Family and Child Service encourages everyone to visit its new web address, www.jfandcs.com then, to learn about everything JF&CS has to offer.

Survivors share songs and memories at Café Europa

Noon-hour social a sold-out success

It began as a way to give a handful of Holocaust survivors a place to meet over lunch and share their stories about a time long ago and far away. It has grown dramatically into a vibrant and joyful monthly celebration that has exceeded anyone's expectations, most of all its delighted organizers at Jewish Family and Child Service and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, another UJA Federation partner agency.

"Café Europa is a lifeline for its 150 or so regulars," said Andrea Pines, JF&CS Coordinator of Volunteer Services, "and being a part of it is one of my great pleasures. It has been amazing to watch the program take off." Survivors look forward to the noon-hour social at the Betel Centre, where volunteers serve them a delicious hot lunch, complete with live entertainment. "An essential part of Café Europa is music, the chance to sing and dance to familiar melodies in Hebrew, Yiddish, Hungarian or Russian. We try to select entertainment that will resonate with our special group," Pines explained. Judging by the seniors' spontaneous singing and dancing at any given time, Café Europa organizers have succeeded.

Toronto has just ended its 25th annual Holocaust Education Week (HEW) and the Café Europa experience is a wonderful reflection of the hopeful stories HEW tried to convey this year. "We're used to focusing on the horror of the Holocaust and, certainly, we must never forget. As our survivor population ages and grows smaller, this is all the more important," Pines observed. "But we also need to keep playing the songs that were familiar during that terrible time, to share the sweet stories of happier days in Germany and Poland, Hungary and Russia. And that's what the members of Café Europa do so well."

The next gathering of Café Europa will be on November 21, from 12:30 to 2 pm. Advance registration is required. For more information, call Andrea Pines, JF&CS Coordinator of Volunteer Services, at 416 638-7800, ext 266.

Reaching out to all corners of Jewish Toronto

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child Service

As a multidisciplinary agency, Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) reaches out to all corners of Jewish Toronto in an ever-expanding number of ways. These days, it seems like the Agency's supporters are reaching back with just as many ways to help JF&CS help those it serves.

Teri Kay, Interim Executive Director of JF&CS, marvels at the commitment and creativity of the community's donors. "I've been part of Jewish Family and Child Service for 35 years," Kay said, "and I'm still bowled over by how people show their support for what we do. The valued funding we receive from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the United Way and the Ontario government enables us to provide essential services to those in need. Individual supporters put a piece of themselves into what they give us, coming up with ideas that are active, involving, and often a whole lot of fun."

Over the summer, the Larry Grossman Foundation for Kids took more than 100 young people to Blue Jays games. The Foundation, a year-round supporter of Jewish Family and Child Service's Big Brothers/Big Sisters program, has treated participants to everything from indoor rock climbing to bowling parties.

Upper Canada Lodge of B'nai Brith Canada also has an annual cure for baseball fever. As in past years, Lodge members took a busload of JF&CS kids to a Blue Jays nail-biter against the Baltimore Orioles, complete with peanuts, popcorn and pizza.

Going to summer camp is often taken for granted, unless you're a child growing up poor. Kehillat Shaarei Torah changed all that for dozens of JF&CS kids last summer. With annual help from UJA Federation, JF&CS subsidizes camp fees for disadvantaged children and youth. "But Kehillat Shaarei Torah recognized that, without basics like sleeping bags, duffles and toiletries, these kids are set apart from their peers," said Eric Kirsh, JF&CS Supervisor of Financial Assistance and Rehabilitation Program. "So the synagogue pitched in and collected an incredible amount of camp necessities and gift certificates to send our kids off in style. It was awesome."

On the heels of camp, JF&CS supporters stepped in and helped outfit kids for school. "We received a phone call from a woman who had rallied a group of friends to collect school supplies for our children, just because they figured there was a need and decided to fill it," Karen Paikin, Manager of Communications, explained. Donated school supplies came from additional sources, including the National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto Chapter. Energetic NCJW volunteers collected and stuffed 120 knapsacks full of toys, pencils and books for children under 13.

And a whole new generation of hands-on helpers is eager to join in. The B'nai Mitzvah youth of Oshawa's Beth Zion Congregation have made a year's commitment to volunteer at JF&CS' Just a Second Shop. Unofficially dubbed "the Durham Depot", this lively group is collecting and sorting gently-used clothes and small household items for the Shop and delivering them each month to the store. They volunteer their time on-site as well, preparing the merchandise for sale.

"JF&CS is so grateful for every act of kindness," said Andrea Pines, JF&CS Coordinator of Volunteer Services. "We're fortunate to have hit a very real and personal chord with members of the community who are motivated to connect with our clients in ways that go beyond straight financial donations. It's definitely a feel-good experience on both sides."

Foster families open their doors - and hearts

Poignant documentary debuts at Appreciation Night

On as little as half an hour's notice, they make up the spare room, set an extra place at the table and rearrange their family dynamic to accommodate a brand new member. They're JF&CS foster families and they open their doors and their hearts to total strangers, day or night, not knowing if the child they welcome will be staying for a week or a year.

Avraham Freidman

Recently, as a prelude to Foster Parent Appreciation Week, Jewish Family and Child Service held a celebratory Appreciation Night to recognize its corps of foster families. At the same time, the agency honoured the long and rich career of its former Supervisor of Placement Services, Avraham Freidman. Although Friedman officially retired in June 2005, he continues to work part-time for JF&CS as project leader of a pilot initiative to serve the special needs of the ultra-Orthodox community in the GTA. And, to top off the emotion-packed evening, the agency debuted its new foster parent recruitment DVD, a documentary featuring many of the families and foster "graduates" who were actually in attendance that night.

The goal of the JF&CS Foster Parent program is family reunification, so every attempt is made to return the child to his or her family as soon as possible. This adds an extra challenge to fostering, because the participating families really do come to regard their foster kids as their own.

"The kids are great and they have enormous potential," said veteran foster parent Nissa Rothman. "I tell my kids right away that we're starting fresh together. I'm not even that interested in the specifics of their past; the most important thing for me to know is their needs."

"Because there were so many facets to the evening, it led to some lovely and unexpected moments," remarked Selma Elzas, JF&CS Foster Care Coordinator. "Some of our staff from years ago who came to pay tribute to Avraham, got to see kids they once worked with who were on hand because of their role onscreen. It was an extraordinary opportunity for these caseworkers, many of whom have retired, to see what wonderful, successful adults these graduates have become."

"To see a twelve-year-old grow into adulthood as a productive member of society, despite any problems in the past, is amazing. You can't even imagine! Being a Foster Parent is one of the best things I've ever done," Rothman said.

To learn more about how you can become a foster parent, contact Selma Elzas, JF&CS Foster Care Coordinator at 416 638-7800, ext 298.

Jewish Family and Child Service knows first hand about the cycle of abuse. The Agency has many practical counselling and educational programs to help those affected address the various needs growing out of the problem. But, until the introduction of Making Choices, a new abuse prevention program for men, the focus has been on women and children and there hasn't been a voluntary group for men who are, or have been, abusive toward their partners.

"Making Choices is a highly appropriate name," explained Eric Kirsh, Financial Assistance and Rehabilitation Supervisor and program facilitator. "That's the essence of this 16-week, mutual support group. It's an educational forum for men who have decided they want to make a change in their abusive or controlling behaviour, but don't know what to do or how."

"In any situation where abuse occurs," Kirsh continued, "the first step toward change is acknowledgement of the problem and accepting responsibility for the behaviour. What's exciting and hopeful about Making Choices is that it involves men who have made that first move because they want to. And we will help them develop the skills necessary to make life different for themselves, their partners and their families."

As pervasive as domestic abuse is in all communities, including our Jewish Toronto population, it's far from being a subject people are comfortable discussing at the dinner table. "Unless we can openly talk about the issue of abuse, its origins and its effects, we can't make the necessary changes to stop it," said Kirsh.

If you are interested in knowing more about Making Choices, contact the JF&CS Intake Department at 416 638-7800.

Survivors credit ORT schools with changing their lives

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A number of Holocaust survivors interviewed as part of a recent ORT Canada research project have credited the organization with changing their lives.

The 14 people living in Toronto and Montreal, who were interviewed by ORT volunteer Judy Geller, attended or taught at ORT schools in such places as Morocco, Israel or Iran during or after World War II.

Geller, whose history in volunteerism includes working at Princess Margaret Hospital and the Art Gallery of Ontario, said she began the research project after speaking to ORT past national president Renette Berman.

"Renette told me that the survivors have stories that should not be lost and suggested that I interview those who had a link to ORT schools."

Geller had not been previously involved in the Jewish community, she said, and knew little about ORT, "so the project was a big learning curve."

She began by contacting the Holocaust Centre of Toronto UJA Federation, who sent out letters seeking prospective interviewees.

She met with the people who responded to the letters, she said, "and was amazed to see how willing they were to share their stories.

"They all – most were in their 70s – spoke from their heart, and expressed their gratitude to ORT. They felt that it was an honour to be [included in the study].

"Without exception, each person had saved their ORT certificate and framed it, and said that the school had given them back their humanity [during a dark period in their lives].

"Some carried on what they had been trained to do at the ORT school, but the important thing was that they developed a skill so they had the ability to step forward and make a contribution to society."

George Scott, one of the interviewees, told Geller that "beyond the inestimable value of self-assurance, of having been given the foundation to face the world, the memory of ORT is an every bright inspiration for me and, I am sure, for millions ORT touched… My ORT certificate is one of my treasured heirlooms for my family."

Eric Goldfarb, who has since died, said, "You had a great number of Jewish refugees from Germany, Austria and so on who were intellectuals and professionals. They had to be trained to work with their hands. That's where ORT stepped in. After the war, all ages needed this training. ORT did tremendous work."

Elly Gotz stressed that "there is no question that ORT has played an important part in my life, first of all teaching me metalwork and toolmaking, which no doubt helped me survive. The ability to do something well has curative power."

Preparing the research, which she plans to compile into a book with photos and a history of the organization, "was an incredible experience" for Geller. "I walked into strangers' homes, and they spent about two hours each opening their lives up to me. I tried not to get emotional, but it was impossible not to.

"Most of the time, I just sat back and listened. They were so into the moment, so back in their lives, that I didn't want to break into their thought processes."

Those interviewed met at a thank-you tea sponsored by ORT, said Geller, "and they all felt like they had knowm each other forever. They wanted to make plans to meet again."

She said that similar projects are being undertaken in New York, and World ORT in London, England, has hired a scholar to research ORT from 1945 to '50.

Researcher works to slow cognition loss among seniors

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Research being conducted at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot may lead to a therapeutic vaccine to stop degeneration of aging or diseased brains, says Michal Schwartz, professor of neuroimmunology at the facility.

Schwartz presented the results of her research to the national annual meeting of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, held last month at the Park Hyatt Hotel in Toronto.

She said that when she began her study on slowing down the loss of cognition and memory that can occur in aging, "I was told to forget about it – that it would ruin my reputation."

Gradually, however, her work has become recognized as groundbreaking, she said.

The key lies in the functioning of the immune and autoimmune systems, Schwartz said.

The immune system, she explained, protects the body against potential dangers such as bacteria, viruses, and microorganisms, while the autoimmune system, if it's working properly, recognizes the body's own tissues and ensures that they are not compromised.

If things are not working properly, the immune system will attack the body's own elements, leading to such diseases as rheumatoid arthritis, lupus, multiple sclerosis and type 1 diabetes.

The thinking used to be, Schwartz said, that autoimmune cells were part of the pathology of illness, and therefore must be destroyed wherever they were found. Through her research into spinal cord injury and brain trauma, however, she discovered that autoimmune cells are needed to fight injury.

For instance, there are 10 million nerves in the spine, and not all of them are usually injured at the same time. Without the appropriate measures, Schwartz said, the non-injured cells will degenerate along with the damaged ones. But if it's made possible, healthy cells will attach themselves to neighbouring nerve fibres and, by doing so, stop the process of degeneration.

It also used to be believed that there are a fixed number of nerve cells and that some are lost as a person ages. If some of the remaining cells are injured, it was thought, there was no way to make new ones.

Schwartz and her team at Weizmann have found, however, that by activating the autoimmune system, rather than destroying it, they can stop the progression of diseases.

The idea, she said, is to enlist the aid of stem cells in the brain that can be utilized for this purpose.

Researchers are still working on finding a drug that will help do this, and current studies are focusing on Copaxone, a drug usually used for multiple sclerosis, Schwartz said.

She stressed that the vaccine she is working on won't prevent a disease from occurring, but will only prevent further damage.

The annual meeting was dedicated to the memory of Arthur Konviser, a past president of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute who died recently.

Sabeel conference

Critics say Ateek regularly infuses his talks with language that invokes Jewish complicity in the crucifixion of Jesus.

At the Toronto conference, Ateek reportedly called for another intifadah, "like the first. The first was non-violent, the second was primarily armed. Palestinians need a non-violent revolution – another intifadah."

Ateek was reported to have said that "some" demonstrators "will be violent. You can't control everyone."

Four American Christian leaders who came to Toronto during the Sabeel conference to warn Canadian churches against taking part in the U.S.-led divestment drive conceded that to date, no church funds have actually been divested from Israel.

However, they stressed that just as important as fighting divestment is countering the anti-Israel propaganda the campaign has produced.

Alona Shportova: "I Want To Be Like All The Girls My Age"

On a Friday night, four years ago, 14-year-old Alona Shportova went out with her friends to dance at the Dolphinarium disco in Tel Aviv. A Palestinian terrorist blew himself up half a metre from them. Alona's best friend was killed instantly. Alona was severely hurt and lost the left side of her brain. Consequently, her right arm and right leg are paralyzed, and she has lost some of her speech and memory capabilities.

The doctors warned her family that her chances for survival were very slim. When she recovered, they said it was because she had the heart of an athlete. Alona is considered a medical miracle. Despite this, she cannot do anything on her own, and is still fragile.

After more than 30 surgeries, Alona is getting the help she needs at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. She uses the gym and the swimming pool for her ongoing therapy. The skilled staff and her new friends offer her much-needed support and encouragement. There she can see that rehabilitation is possible.

The four Beit Halochem Centres in Israel offer both physical and emotional support to the more than 50,000 disabled veterans, victims of terror and their families. Giving our heroes the best care and rehabilitation they deserve is our priority.

We are devoted to helping Israeli disabled war veterans and victims of terror rehabilitate themselves physically and emotionally.

New Aish synagogue opens doors in Thornhill

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aish HaTorah recently opened its first full-service synagogue in Thornhill.

It's a relatively rare move for the Jewish outreach organization, said Rabbi Avram Rothman, who was appointed full-time rabbi of the congregation, housed at the Aish HaTorah Dan Family Community Centre on Clark Ave. Only Toronto and Los Angeles have full-service Aish HaTorah synagogues, he said.

The congregation, known as the Thornhill Community Shul, opened in September. The change was initiated by Rabbi Dan Rand, managing director of Aish Toronto.

"Aish HaTorah is primarily an educational institution," Rabbi Rothman explained in an interview. Although Shabbat and holiday services have been held in the building since it was opened about 10 years ago, there was not a full-service synagogue, he said. "Aish decided they were doing the synagogue a disservice."

Rabbi Rothman was previously a "very part-time" staffer. Other Aish HaTorah rabbis also helped out, but their primary duties focused on education and outreach, said Rabbi Rothman.

The congregation, which began as an outgrowth of the educational institution, is financially independent of Aish but philosophically linked. There are about 120 member families, and 1,000 people attended Rosh Hashanah services.

Most of the synagogue members are ba'alei teshuvah, and many have moved to Toronto from other communities including Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, said the rabbi. Some have become fully observant; others are "on the path."

One of the goals of the congregation is to provide a supportive community, he said. "In no way do we try to replace family," the rabbi stressed, adding that the synagogue encourages congregants to maintain good relationships with family members who are not as Jewishly observant.

"It has become clear we have to supplement the family, if the family is away or has different beliefs. If someone has a baby, we organize meals for them. We all open our homes to their [simcha] guests, provide meals, and celebrate with them."

Also, noted the rabbi, "we feel it's very important to reach out to unaffiliated neighbours and give them the opportunity to explore their Jewish roots without obligation."

Like many of his congregants, Rabbi Rothman, a 48-year-old father of four and grandfather of two, is also a ba'al teshuvah. A native of Syracuse, N.Y., he was motivated to become religious as a teenager after he was first exposed to Jewish philosophy, following a BBYO trip to Israel at age 16.

He studied at Ohr Somayach yeshiva in Israel for four years before returning to the United States, where he was ordained from Ner Israel Rabbinical College in Baltimore in 1980, the same year he married his wife, Ruth.

Concurrently with his rabbinical studies, he attended Johns Hopkins University and obtained a master's degree in guidance and counselling, with a specialty in marriage counselling. Later, he received a PhD in comparative literature from Clark University through its distance learning program.

Before coming to Toronto in 1990 to work in fundraising and administration for Ohr Somayach, another education and outreach program, Rabbi Rothman served for seven years in Boulder, Co., where he was rabbi of the local Hillel Foundation. From there, he went to Worcester, Mass., and worked for the local Jewish federation.

Since he arrived in Toronto, he has also been a lecturer for Arachim, an Israeli-based outreach program, and was affiliated with Eitz Chaim Day Schools as an administrator.

But it was in Boulder – where he interacted with so many students as well as poet Alan Ginsberg and 60s' radical Abbie Hoffman – that he developed his desire to "do what I'm doing now – to expose people to traditional thought who have not previously had the opportunity."

LOCKS OF LOVE: Hanna Strub, left, from Hamilton, and Tamara Rebick, from Toronto, are two of the young people who got haircuts and donated their hair to Locks of Love, at the Eastern Canadian Region, United Synagogue Youth's (ECRUSY) fall kinnus. Locks of Love provides wigs at no cost for children with alopecia. More than $1,300 was raised through the hair cutting for USY's charity, Tikun Olam. Tikun Olam allocates money to more than 100 charities worldwide, provides scholarships for Israel programming and helps further the Conservative movement in Israel.

Will world back Israel if it pre-emptively strikes Iran?

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's recent threat to "wipe Israel off the map" received massive media attention, especially in the West.

In Canada, most newspapers ran editorials denouncing Ahmadinejad; several also ran opinion pieces.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On CTV National News (Oct. 28), a 2½-minute report by Janis Mackey Frayer showed scenes of anti-Israel fervour in Tehran. Frayer interviewed Dore Gold, an adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who said: "You cannot threaten to exterminate a fellow UN member and [expect that] the world will remain silent."

Frayer concluded her report: "Refusing to acknowledge Israel's right to exist is nothing new for Iran, but Ahmadinejad urged a new wave of Palestinian attacks." She noted the Oct. 26 suicide bombing in Hadera, in which five Israelis were killed.

While CBC Radio News and several Newsworld programs reported on the Iranian threat in some detail, CBC's The National devoted only 15 seconds to the story. On Oct. 28, anchor Diana Swain reported that the Iranian president's "comment" about wiping Israel from the map "has drawn widespread criticism, including from Canada." Why the CBC's flagship news program decided to downplay the seriousness of the Iranian president's tirade is an open question.

As the initial coverage of outrage subsided, a more analytical approach about Ahmadinejad and his impact on developments in Iran followed. For instance, on Nov. 2, Germany's Der Spiegel reported: "Iran's nuclear program may have already taken a decisive step in the direction of nuclear weapons in recent weeks. According to information obtained by Spiegel, the president has placed himself at the head of a new 'Control Center for Nuclear Issues,' which is managed by his friends, the Revolutionary Guards. This enables Ahmadinejad to direct all nuclear developments himself. With intelligence official Farhad Rahbar, who manages the government's budget, as its deputy director, the organization has unlimited financial resources."

Der Spiegel noted that Iran has the world's second largest oil reserves after Saudi Arabia and is the world's fourth-largest exporter of oil. Its natural gas reserves are also enormous. This energy wealth provides Iran with massive income.

Iran is the principal backer of the terror group Hezbollah, which operates in Lebanon and the West Bank. Iran also supports Islamic Jihad, which took responsibility for the Oct. 26 terrorist attack in Hadera on the same day that Ahmadinejad delivered his genocidal tirade against Israel. (Samuel Segev reported in the Winnipeg Free Press on Nov.1 that Ramadan Shalah, a leader of Islamic Jihad who was in Tehran at the time, along with a leader from Hamas, "gave the order for the bombing in Hadera as a 'gift' to Ahmadinejad.")

In "A pariah among nations" (National Post, Nov. 1), David Frum raised some essential questions that had been overlooked by most analysts: "[A]n emerging nuclear power, Iran, has just threatened to annihilate an existing nuclear power, Israel. Dare Israel now wait until Iran has completed its bomb to see whether President Ahmadinejad means what he says? And if Israel does not wait – if it pre-empts the Iranian bomb program – how will Iran respond?

"Presumably by intensifying its support for anti-Israel and anti-Western terrorist movements. And so Ahmadinejad has just pushed the whole region closer to a major war."

Frum wrote: "The only way to avert war is to stop Iran's bomb – and that is going to require stronger medicine than International Atomic Energy condemnations and [UN] Security Council resolutions."

In 1981, when Israel destroyed Iraq's nuclear reactor in a pinpoint airstrike, the whole world – including the United States – condemned it. Years later, when it became known that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had been working to redevelop nuclear weapons, much of the world belatedly commended Israel for its prescience.

With the notable exception of Russia and most Islamic and Arab countries, almost all world leaders immediately condemned Ahmadinejad for his threat to annihilate Israel. Some analysts said this may not have been because Israel was the immediate target, but because others – particularly in Western Europe – could become targets of this increasingly fanatical regime whose ballistic missiles have Europe well within its range. Media reports almost uniformly emphasized the gravity of Ahmadinejad's threats.

What if all other efforts to rein in Iran's nuclear program failed, and Israel believed it had no choice but to pre-empt the development of an Iranian bomb? Would the world continue to support Israel against the threat of a nuclear Iran?

Shomrai Shabbos launches its expansion with dinner

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Shomrai Shabbos Chevra Mishnayos Congregation has been part of Toronto's Orthodox Jewish Community for more than a century.

Located at 585 Glengrove Ave. for the past 40 years, the synagogue, which continues to attract a young membership, is flourishing.

To accommodate its unprecedented growth, the synagogue is having a dinner on Nov. 20 at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue (BAYT) to mark the launching of an expansion and renovation project that will include a new bais hamigdash (learning centre).

The dinner, An Evening of Honour is chaired by a past president, Eddie Philips. The guest speaker will be Dayan Chanoch Ehrentreu, rosh beit din of the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth. A group of individuals who have demonstrated their leadership and dedication to the synagogue and the community will be honoured.

To celebrate the launch of the expansion project, the names of the shul's honorees will be inscribed on the wooden scrolls and the crown of a new sefer Torah, which is being written in memory of the congregation's former spiritual leader, Rabbi Gedalia Felder.

The atzei chayim, the two wooden dowels that roll the Torah, will be engraved with the names of dinner's primary honorees, Anne and Jack Weinbaum and Shirley and Harry Marder.

The silver crown of the sefer Torah will be inscribed with the names of seven individuals who give regular classes at the synagogue, seven past presidents, three outstanding community personalities, and the synagogue's longstanding kohen, in recognition of their contributions to the synagogue and the community.

Rabbi Gedalia Felder

Philips attributes the growth of Shomrai Shabbos "to the warm and welcoming environment that our shul provides."

He adds that the expansion project and tribute dinner are community events. "Our shul is in a unique position in Toronto's Jewish community as it houses the beit din, the Jewish court system.

"Over the past 30 or 40 years, Shomrai Shabbos has proven to be a strong starting point for many young Jewish community members because of the affordable housing in the area.

"Young people can make a start here, have children, and some subsequently move away. But these people still feel a strong connection and affection for the shul."

Philips notes that the continuing growth of Shomrai Shabbos is a reflection of its religious leadership. "Our spiritual leader, Rabbi Yacov Felder, has a very strong personal relationship with the membership, as did his revered father, Rabbi Gedalia Felder.

"He continues to be a source of inspiration and guidance to families inside and outside the synagogue, a pattern set by his scholarly father."

Rabbi Yacov Felder told The CJN that "it is a privilege to be the rabbi of Shomrai Shabbos Chevra Mishnayos, which has been blessed with such illustrious rabbanim – my father and prior to him, Rabbi Yosef Weinreb, z"l.

"It is an honour for me to be linked in this chain of our shul blessed with such wonderful, dedicated and sincere members who are committed to Torah and to values and ideals."

Philips notes that the writing of the new sefer Torah gives the synagogue and community an opportunity to be actively involved.

Amichai Harari, the synagogue's immediate past president, is heading the event's committee. The dinner executive includes Eli Marder, Ira Marder, Zev Rosenblum, Lawrence Weinberg and Leiby Weiss.

For more information about the expansion project or to reserve for the dinner, call event co-ordinator Shaindy Cohen Goldstein, 416-830-9321 or e-mail dinner@shomraishabos.com.

Martin to address General Assembly

Some of this year's Israeli delegates represent a new phenomenon that has arisen only in the past year or two, said Bielski. It is only recently that Israelis have been able to financially support Jewish causes in Israel in a major way, he said.

"We have to learn a lot from the North American system," he said, citing the notion of shared responsibility.

Probably the most pressing need today that is addressed with money collected through UJA campaigns – in addition to Operation Promise, a $160 million initiative announced in September and aimed at helping Jews in Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union – is education for Jewish children in Israel and all over the world, said Bielski. Many children in Israel live under the poverty line, he noted.

"Israel is still a growing country, and the government has got so much to look after that we Jewish people all over the world would have to raise more dollars to meet the needs of aliyah, absorption, Jewish education and what we call 'youth futures.'"

The latter designation refers to a two-year-old project of the Jewish Agency that addresses the educational needs of Jewish children in Israel and in locations such as Russia and South America.

KidCoaches helps children prepare for future

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A program brought to Ontario by husband and wife team Geri and Harry Berholz has helped more than 500 children, ranging in age from eight to 12, to develop leadership and life skills.

This school year, a hundred trained adult volunteers will work one to one with 100 children under KidCoaches, which is part of the Future Possibilities program. Volunteers are matched with children who attend schools in under-serviced communities and have limited access to leadership opportunities and extra-curricular activities.

The schools at which KidCoaches operates are selected by the boards of education of Toronto, York Region and London, Ont. The students are picked by their teachers.

"These children often come from single-parent families, immigrant families, and experience economic hardship," says Geri Berholz, the executive director of Future Possibilities.

The children first participate in a 24-week Future Possibilities educational program called Ready, Set, Goal. After that, they meet with the KidCoaches four times a year for a full day of activities and workshops. There is also a gala graduation event.

"The children selected [for the program] express a desire and motivation to become Future Possibilitarians," says Geri.

"Our KidCoaches help these children discover their gifts through half-hour telephone conversations [and encourage them] to [participate in] community projects, such as [volunteering to help] the homeless [or volunteering at] a food bank, the Canadian Cancer Society, a seniors' residence and many others."

"Working one on one, the coaches tell us how rewarding it is to find a spark in the kids," says Harry.

Geri and Harry Berholz brought KidCoaches to Canada. The program has helped more than 500 children, ranging in age from eight to 12, to develop leadership and life skills.

Geri is a former secondary school educator and ran Geri's Eatin' Centre before she became a certified coach.

Harry, a lawyer for 23 years until he sold his practice, was looking for another challenge, and together with Geri, became a certified life coach through the California-based Coach Training Institute.

Harry opened Above & Beyond: The Centre For Adventurous Learning with his nephew, Andrew Levison. Geri established Directions Career Coaching Services. "We wanted to bring our coaching skills to children," says Geri.

Future Possibilities was brought to Geri and Harry's attention in 1999 when their children, Robin and Danny, were volunteers in the program in New York. Both Robin and Danny, now back in Toronto, along with with their son David, volunteer as KidCoaches.

"The program is growing each year," says Harry, "and with the addition of more and more schools requesting our participation, we need more volunteer KidCoaches in the GTA and London."

Along with a board of directors, Future Possibilities has an advisory board and a junior board of directors made up of 30 kids who graduated from the program.

The program is funded through the Trillium Foundation, corporate sponsors and an annual gala concert titled Centre Stage, which is held in June at the Isabel Bader Theatre. The benefit concert features talented young performers, including some youngsters who participated in the Future Possibilities sessions.

"Our aim is to empower children to think boldly, communicate powerfully, act generously and live joyfully," says Geri.

"Our unique curriculum provides the KidCoaches with the training and support they need to make a lasting, positive difference in the life of a child.

"We receive numerous letters from our graduates telling us how well they are now doing. It is most gratifying."

This year, the Future Possibilities program began on Oct. 23. For more information, visit www.fpcanada.org.

Evaluating Yitzhak Rabin's legacy

Only Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, with 27 per cent, outpolled Sharon in that survey – but 73 per cent hold that Rabin's and Peres' own Labor party is doing little to promote the slain leader's legacy.

The poll also shows that nearly 70 per cent believe another political assassination is likely in Israel.

Rabin wanted to be a water engineer, but his belief in the need for a strong army made him a general. He was always defence-minded, a man with limited faith in the goodwill of Israel's neighbours and a conviction that only a militarily strong Israel can survive in the Middle East.

For Rabin, the main strategic goal was to secure Israel's survival in a tough neighbourhood. Peace was a means to that end, not an end in itself.

In 1993, Rabin cautiously embraced the Oslo peace process with the Palestinians in the hope that it would lead to Israel's acceptance in the region, but he insisted that it be reversible: if the process threatened Israel's security instead of advancing it, he insisted, Israel would be able to revert to the pre-Oslo status quo. Some see that as a shocking bit of naivete from a man who, at other times, displayed keen strategic thinking.

Rabin called Oslo "an experiment in laboratory conditions," which he believed could be stopped at the first signs of failure. It's not clear whether Rabin would have stuck to that principle had he lived, since many Israeli politicians who initially were skeptical of the peace process felt constrained to see it through, even as evidence that the process was failing became overwhelming.

Five years after Rabin's death, the Oslo concept was put to the test at Camp David in July 2000. It failed:

Then-prime minister Ehud Barak was unable to reach agreement with then-Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat on a final settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The result was nearly five years of Palestinian terrorism. Yet Barak, and many in Labor and parties further to the left, insist that if negotiators do get back to work one day, they should pick up roughly from where Barak's team left off.

Some speculate that Rabin might have succeeded where Barak failed, arguing that he would not have laboured under the burden of the three-year interruption under Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, which Palestinians claim eroded their confidence in the Oslo process.

Moreover, unlike Barak, Rabin was trusted and even liked by Palestinian leaders – though it's not clear if Arafat's protestations of affection for Rabin after his death were anything more than crocodile tears.

And no one will ever know whether, by force of his personality, Rabin could have overcome the huge differences between Israel and the Palestinians on basic issues such as refugees, Jerusalem and borders.

Many believe that if Rabin had failed to bridge those gaps, he would have called an end to the Oslo experiment and gone down the unilateral route the way Sharon has done, and for much the same reasons.

Rabin's strategic outlook was very close to Sharon's: Like Sharon, he put a premium on close ties with the United States, prioritized the achievement of a state of non-belligerency with potential adversaries and recognized the long-term demographic problem caused by Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

That in itself probably would have been enough to lead Rabin down the unilateral road.

The fact that so many Israelis see Sharon as Rabin's heir is one of the most significant facts in Israeli politics today. It is symptomatic of the blurring between security-minded peacemaking in Labor and Likud and the creation of a new ideological centre in Israeli politics, in which both Rabin and Sharon are iconic leadership figures.

Sharon's image as a security-minded peacemaker in the Rabin tradition wins him the support of large segments of Labor's right wing, one of the main reasons for his enormous cross-party popularity in Israel.

Even if Rabin's legacy continues to dominate the political scene through Sharon, however, the drive for tolerance and reconciliation in the wake of the assassination has been far less successful.

The Yediot Achronot poll shows a disturbing degree of support on the far right for Rabin's jailed assassin, Yigal Amir. Some 20 per cent of those polled believe Amir should be eligible for parole. Carmi Gillon, head of the Shin Bet security service at the time of the assassination, says the findings show that the chances for another political assassination in Israel are high.

"There is a group of hundreds of thousands of people, not all of whom are killers, but who all think the Rabin assassination achieved its purpose by stopping the Oslo process," Gillon said in a recent interview. "They think today that if Sharon were to disappear, the moves in the West Bank would disappear/evaporate too."

Amir's family feels confident enough to make inflammatory remarks and demand his early release. In a television documentary, Amir's mother declared that she would like to see all the politicians who supported Sharon's withdrawal plan "hanged in the city square."

One of Amir's brothers, Amitai, said Amir had served a long enough sentence because the man he killed was "a criminal." Amir himself is said to want a retrial because of "new ballistic evidence."

The chances of Amir being paroled or retried are negligible. President Moshe Katsav recently said he would never pardon Amir, and he expressed the hope that no future presidents of the state would ever pardon Rabin's killer.

But Gillon and other experts say another potential assassin could be lurking somewhere in the extremist milieu that produced Yigal Amir.

On the 10th anniversary of Rabin's assassination, they reiterate a chilly warning: Israel's brittle democracy withstood one assassination, but may not be able to withstand another.

Collegians 'do the write thing' at General Assembly

By LENI REISS
Special to the CJN

Some 35 aspiring journalists from 33 universities, most of whom work on their school newspapers, have been selected to participate in the 16th annual Do the Write Thing program at the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities (GA), which is being held in Toronto.

Among them are two students from Eilat, thanks to arrangements made by the Partnership 2000 project between Toronto and its Israeli sister city.

The primary goal of Do the Write Thing is to impart information on such subjects as objectivity in the media and the dynamics of power between the media and the Jewish establishment in both North America and Israel.

To that end and in addition to attending major GA sessions and plenary meetings Nov. 13 to 15, the students will hear from such sources as Gary Rosenblatt, publisher and editor of the New York Jewish Week, and Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor of the Canadian Jewish News, on "Covering Israel in the American Jewish Press."

A panel of Israeli journalists will share their thoughts on "Journalism From an Israeli Point of View," Jewish Agency spokesperson Yardin Vatikay will speak on "Journalism's Impact on Israel's Image," and Prof. Gil Troy will describe his views on Zionism.

Do the Write Thing alumni have gone on to achieve success in a variety of related fields. Noam Neusner was special assistant to U.S. President George W. Bush for economic speechwriting as well as White House liaison to the Jewish community. Dan Schifrin is director of literary programs at the National Foundation for Jewish Culture, and Rustin Silverstein, now at Harvard law school, worked as a congressional press secretary and a producer for the MSNBC show Hardball With Chris Matthews.

Since the students will be writing about their experiences in the program for various publications and hometown newspapers, some enterprising the Do the Write Thing participants will approach people during the GA to ask for opinions on the events of the day.

Sponsors and supporters of Do the Write Thing include the Jewish Agency for Israel, the American Zionist Movement and USD/Hagshama and the Department of Zionist Activities of the World Zionist Organization.

A night of Storahtelling

By ANNA DURBIN
Special to the CJN

For most of the packed house in the Robert Gill Theatre, the opening performance at ReJewvenation: The Futures of the Jewish Culture was thoroughly enjoyable.

The conference, held Oct. 28 to 31 at the University of Toronto and organized primarily by U of T faculty members Andrea Most, Luis Kaplan and Anna Shternshis, featured academic papers, roundtable discussions, and theatrical and musical performances. It explored Jewish culture in the 21st century, and particularly current efforts to blend the traditional, such as klezmer music, with the contemporary, including queer weddings, drag and cyberspace.

The opening event featured keynote speaker Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, who talked about the "Performance of Jewishness." A professor of performance studies at the Tisch School of the Arts at New York University, Kirshenblatt-Gimblett is also affiliated with the department of Hebrew and Judaic studies.

She described a newly developing, edgy Jewish subculture, promoted by those who reject conventional Jewish beliefs or have been rejected by conventional Jewish believers – for example, homosexual Jews or "halfies" (children with one Jewish parent).

Kirshenblatt-Gimblett showed pictures of some famous "halfies," including Goldie Hawn, Howard Stern and – surprisingly to many in the audience – Pete Sampras. Her vision of Judaism is anti-authoritarian, eclectic and includes taking apart traditional elements and putting them back together in a non-traditional fashion.

Some examples she used included a picture of a woman lighting Chanukah candles. The woman was sporting a bra made of two strategically placed yarmulkes with a single string.

UWO conference aims to raise awareness of Darfur

By KYLE GORDON
Special to the CJN

After the Holocaust, many of us thought the world vowed to never again close its eyes to mass human suffering.

But speakers at the "Crisis in Darfur" conference at the University of Western Ontario say that the world is again ignoring mass human suffering – in the Darfur region of western Sudan.

The fighting in Darfur erupted in 2003 when two allied rebel groups attacked military installations. The Sudanese government responded by allowing the Janjaweed militias to clear civilians from areas considered disloyal to the government. Over the last two years, the militia attacks have led to displacement, murder, looting and mass rape in western Sudan.

The sentiment "never again" was first uttered after the Holocaust, when people said they did not know how or found it hard to believe a genocide of such magnitude could happen in a civilized European country, Alain Goldshlager said at the conference.

The Holocaust Literature Institute at UWO, in partnership with student groups and community and not-for-profit groups, organized the conference in the hopes that those who learn about the crisis in Darfur will become active in raising awareness.

Norman Epstein, a physician and co-founder of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan, believes that anyone can make a difference.

Like many activists, Epstein is haunted by the images of slavery, rape, starvation and murder in Sudan. With 400,000 people dead, 2.5 million displaced and 3.5 million hungry, he says intervention is essential.

He urges everyone to get involved. Write to your member of Parliament, contact the prime minister and force the Canadian government to get involved, he said. Use the media as a moral catalyst to inspire people to do more. "It only takes five people to make something an issue.

"It is unacceptable for [the Jewish population] to say the world let us down in the Holocaust. Our painful past means we must speak out now. African lives are just as important."

The fight to stop the crimes against humanity is a marathon – change can and does happen, Epstein added. He encourages westerners to turn their outrage into action and to start now. "Believe you can make a difference; I do."

Keynote speaker Gerald Caplan, a leading Canadian authority on genocide and an internationally recognized expert on the Rwandan genocide, addressed a forum on the topic of genocide prevention.

According to Caplan, the Rwandan genocide may have been the most preventable genocide of the 20th century.

During the Rwandan genocide, 800,000 Tutsi and moderate Hutus were slaughtered by Hutu extremists over the course of 100 days in 1994. The Rwandan genocide is a historically significant event not only because of the large number of deaths in such a short period but also because of the reprehensible lack of intervention on the part of the western countries, Caplan said.

The crisis in Darfur needs and deserves the support of the West, he said, adding that if the Rwandan genocide has taught the West anything about the importance of intervention, then we must take action now.

Classic Creations Continues To Lead In Innovative Designs

If you are in the market for a beautiful piece of jewellery or a fine timepiece, then you owe it to yourself to visit Classic Creations in the Newtonbrook Plaza.

When you first step into Classic Creations, you can sense the warmth and friendliness that has kept their clients coming back for over 21 years. Their knowledgeable sales professionals take every effort to ensure they find that perfect piece just for you.

Their reputation for custom design work has become the envy of the jewellery industry. The special care and attention given to each piece by their master craftsmen is only surpassed by the delight and joy on the face of the recipient. Each piece is designed to reflect the distinctive individual taste of the wearer.

But where their true strength lies is in their diamonds. Whether you are looking for a Princess cut, Radiant cut, Cushion cut, or whatever other shape diamond, you can rest assured you will find the perfect diamond to meet your own budget.

They carry a large selection of beautiful timepieces, such as Baume & Mercier, Ebel, Concord, Tag Heuer, MontBlanc, Raymond Weil, Movado, TechnoMarine, Swiss Army, just to name a few.

But one brand's distinctive style stands out above the rest. CORUM.

Celebrating their 50th Anniversary, CORUM has always taken pride in being a distinctively "different" Swiss watch manufacturer. One of the company's many signature models is the Admiral's Cup, featuring nautical pennants that correspond to maritime code. Two Admiral's Cup timepieces being launched this year are new versions of the Admiral's Cup Chrono 44 Regatta and the Admiral's Cup Tides 44 Regatta. One crafted from stainless steel, the other from 18kt pink gold. They are extremely characteristic of the Admiral's Cup line, the black bezel with twelve brightly colored hour-marker nautical pennants and matte black lacquered dial, topped by an anti-glare sapphire crystal. The unique bracelet design features a carbon graphite cover on the center links, a cutting-edge material.

Peterborough cemetery's plan riles Jewish plot owners

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In an effort to stop a Peterborough, Ont., cemetery from building a 17,000-square-foot visitation centre and an 85-car parking lot next to Jewish graves, almost 100 plot owners voted last week to fire the cemetery's board of directors.

In an ongoing story that has been unfolding for more than a month, many Jews and non-Jews in the city are up in arms over the plan, which some say contradicts a cemetery policy that Jewish plot owners have respected for 50 years.

Little Lake Cemetery, a non-denominational, not-for-profit cemetery established in 1850, has a 50-year-old section for Jewish burials that's owned by Peterborough's Beth Israel Synagogue.

Beth Israel and members of the Jewish community say they have an agreement with the cemetery that forbids Jewish plot owners from erecting vertical headstones so as not to obstruct the view of Little Lake, which is next to the Jewish section of the graveyard.

In an Oct. 1 letter to Peterborough Mayor Sylvia Sutherland, city council and the Little Lake Cemetery board of directors, Beth Israel board member Erica Cherney –who could not attend a council meeting on the issue because it was held on Erev Rosh Hashanah – said the plan would "negatively impact" the Jewish section of the cemetery.

"The 17,000-square-foot building planned near Little Lake will totally impede our view of the lake. We find it quite ironic that having respected the terms of the agreement, this new plan destroys both the sightlines and esthetics of the cemetery, which we have been obligated to maintain for over 50 years," Cherney wrote.

For that reason, Beth Israel president Larry Gillman said, building the $3-million centre would be hypocritical.

"I find it ironic that there is a policy about erecting headstones that has been observed for 50 years, but they are erecting a huge building and a parking lot," he said.

The board has said it wants to eventually turn the visitation centre into a funeral home when new provincial legislation that would allow funeral homes on cemetery grounds passes next year. The board says it needs revenue from the home to compete with growing multinational funeral home companies and ensure the cemetery remains financially viable well into the future.

But Gillman, a financial planner, said he's reviewed the cemetery's books and doesn't believe it's in any looming financial danger.

"I'm not sure [building a centre] needs to be done."

Little Lake manager Kryn Vandermey told the Peterborough Examiner last month that he doesn't think the cemetery is being inconsistent, because the real reason for the ban on upright monuments was that the land the shul bought 50 years ago was part of a buffer zone intended to keep such gravestones from getting too close to a nearby street.

In the latest chapter of this story, plot owners who oppose the visitation centre attended a meeting last week in Peterborough and voted to fire the current board members, then proceeded to replace them with newly elected ones.

According to Little Lake company bylaws, a resolution to remove a director can pass if at least two-thirds of attendees at a plot-owners meeting vote in favour of doing so.

At last week's meeting, 72 plot owners voted to remove the board. There were another 20 proxy votes in favour, with nine votes opposed.

But the cemetery company and the original board members – none of whom attended last week's meeting – don't recognize the vote, because they say notice for the meeting wasn't extended to at least one-tenth of the cemetery's approximately 20,000 plot owners, as required by company bylaws.

"[The results] cannot mean anything to the company," Vandermey told the Examiner.

Gillman said that as a concession to appease Jewish plot owners, Vandermey and the cemetery board have offered to put a greenbelt between the 85-car parking lot and their plots.

As well, in response to the public outcry, Gillman said, the city is investigating whether city zoning bylaws will allow the cemetery to erect the building.

Until zoning questions are settled, the centre can't be built and no changes can be made to the plans, he said.

Gillman, who supports the decision to oust the cemetery's board, said that while the plan directly affects Jewish plot owners, this is a wider community issue.

"We don't want this to be a Jewish issue. It affects the whole community. There are enough people who don't want this to happen," Gillman said.

"It'll be interesting to see what happens."

Kitchener-Waterloo shuls work together

Rabbi Bloch said that when Beth Jacob was founded in what is now Kitchener in 1908, it was the only congregation in the area.

It wasn't until 1964 that Temple Shalom in Waterloo was founded.

He said that in the past, Kitchener was a more of an industrial town while Waterloo was more of a university town.

People in the retail business looked for an Orthodox service at Beth Jacob and students at university tended to be more attracted to a Reform service, which is what Temple Shalom offered.

In 1989, when Beth Jacob's Rabbi Philip Rosensweig died after leading the congregation for more than 35 years, Rabbi Bloch said, many congregants left for Temple Shalom, looking for a change.

This caused a bit of a rift between the two shuls, but Rabbi Bloch said last month's ceremony will help to continue to bridge the gap.

"It's important for us to understand how tough it is for small [Jewish] communities all over North America. We have to concentrate on the things that unite us rather than divide us," he said.

Dykaar said Simchat Torah was especially significant for Temple Shalom this year, because it was the first time members were able to take part in the tradition of finishing one scroll and beginning a new one.

Both Papernick and Dykaar agree that the most important aspect of the transfer was the implications it has for small Jewish communities everywhere.

"The real lesson is that there are opportunities to co-operate and not be held back by religious differences within different sects. I think this is a really nice example where two congregations were able to work together," Dykaar said.

"We hope this will show other Jewish communities in Canada that we need to be one," Papernick added. "It should show others that this is a way to strengthen a community."

Bertrand awaits Quebec Bar Association's sanctions

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Lawyer Guy Bertrand has issued an apology to Justice Minister Irwin Cotler for alleging that he and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) tried to influence a case involving his client, former Rwandan official Leon Mugesera, whose deportation case was before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Earlier last week, Bertrand pleaded guilty before a Quebec Bar Association disciplinary committee to the two charges against him of violating the legal profession's code of ethics.

His penalty, which could be as severe as expulsion for life from the bar, will not likely be known for weeks or even months, said bar spokesperson Sylvie Berthiaume.

Bertrand, who has been in practice for over 30 years in Quebec City, was severely reprimanded by the Supreme Court in June for expressing "anti-Semitic sentiment and views that most might have thought had disappeared from Canadian society, and even more so from legal debate in Canada." His remarks were found to be not only groundless, but "scandalous" by the high court, which upheld Mugesera's deportation.

In his letter to Cotler, Bertrand writes that he deeply regrets what he said about Cotler and blames the "extreme emotion" surrounding the Mugesera case, which was in the courts for a decade.

In November 2004, in a motion attempting to halt the proceedings, Bertrand alleged that Cotler colluded with CJC to ensure that the federal government won its appeal of the Federal Court's overturning of the deportation order against Mugesera. He is accused of inciting genocide of the Tutsi minority in his native country in 1992.

Bertrand alleged that in the summer of 2004, Cotler proposed the nomination to the Supreme Court of Rosalie Abella, wife of CJC war-crimes committee chair Irving Abella, to stack the case against Mugesera. Irving Abella had earlier written to then-immigration minister Denis Coderre, urging him to appeal the Federal Court decision in Mugesera's favour.

CJC, which has deplored the Rwandan genocide and lobbied for more vigilance against war criminals finding haven in Canada, was an intervenor in the case, as was B'nai Brith Canada.

Bertrand continues in his letter that he now regrets "giving the impression to the ordinary citizen in society that Mr. Cotler could have acted incorrectly by naming one of his friends [Rosalie Abella]" to the Supreme Court.

Although Abella recused herself from Mugesera's case two months before it went to the Supreme Court, Bertrand alleged that her presence on the bench "contaminated" her colleagues, that they could not be impartial, and therefore the case should be quashed.

Cotler declined to comment on the matter last week because the bar was still considering the sanctions that should be brought against Bertrand, Cotler's press secretary Marc Chalifoux said. He could not confirm that Cotler had received a letter from Bertrand.

"The Supreme Court knows I'm an honest man, an honest lawyer and they all know because they're human beings that they can make mistakes, and so can I," Bertrand told the media after making the apology.

In August, the bar's syndic accused Bertrand of two counts: the first, of making a public statement "prejudicial to a case pending before a court," and the second, of "lacking moderation by making arguments and statements that were irresponsible, excessive and unjustified by the set of circumstances and facts."

The syndic, which investigates wrongdoing by bar members, said Bertrand's allegations were "extremely grave. It's practically accusations of corruption. It's the worst thing that one can reproach a court with."

In pleading guilty, Bertrand told the disciplinary committee that he now recognizes that his remarks about Cotler and the Jewish community, as well as his impugning the whole Supreme Court, were immoderate and wrong.

"I went too far in giving the impression… that justice was arranged," he told the tribunal, chaired by Rejean Blais. "I failed in my duty to serve justice… I committed a blunder," adding that he had, however, always acted in good faith.

Bertrand has steadfastly maintained that he never used the term "Jewish conspiracy," rather that it was the Globe and Mail that coined it, and it was later repeated by the Supreme Court.

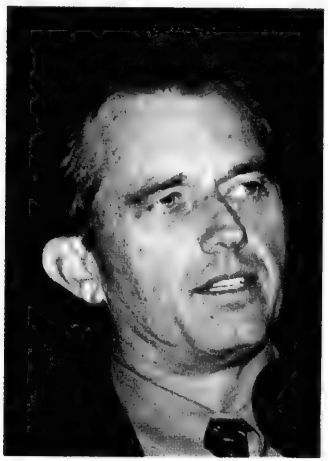
Kennedy praises JNF at Ottawa Negev Dinner

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israel's dedication to water conservation and the environment stands in sharp contrast to the United States, a country with great resources that's squandering them with no concern for future generations, Robert F. Kennedy Jr. said in a keynote address at this year's Ottawa Negev Dinner.



Robert Kennedy Jr.

Kennedy, a well-known environmentalist and advocate for clean water who speaks around the world – often at JNF events and to other Jewish groups – praised JNF's work in Israel, saying it "really is the model for what every other country in the world ought to be doing… I am so impressed by this organization and the extraordinary commitment we see wherever Jews are anywhere in the world."

Speaking about the state of America's waterways, Kennedy said that "630,000 children born in the U.S. every year are exposed to dangerous levels of mercury in their mother's womb."

It would be easy and inexpensive to remove the mercury, but it's not being done because "this White House has been undoing all the environmental laws," he said.

"There is nothing radical about the idea, as the JNF knows, of clean water and clean air for our children," he said.

Kennedy said he greatly admires the project Stern chose as the beneficiary of proceeds from the Ottawa Negev Dinner: JNF research centres in the Negev Desert that use nanotechnology in filters, as well as microorganisms, to clean and desalinate water so as to significantly reduce purification costs in Israel.

The project will not only benefit Israelis, he said, but has the potential to make a huge difference to billions of people worldwide.

Stern noted that "1.2 billion people must use contaminated water. Four hundred children die per hour in the developing world… this is preventable. The opportunity to make a difference is extraordinary."

Stern, a colorectal cancer specialist who came to Ottawa in 1994 to become chair of the department of surgery at the University of Ottawa, is originally from Toronto, where he was affiliated with Mount Sinai and Princess Margaret hospitals.

He spoke of how his mother's family survived World War II in hiding in Holland and how, being a child of survivors, he and his four younger siblings always knew that they "would have to contribute."

Hamilton shul lures families with earlier Friday service time

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton is embarking on an experiment intended to attract more people – and particularly parents with young families – to Friday-night services.

Starting this Shabbat (on Nov. 11), the Reform congregation, which was established more than 150 years ago, will be changing the time of its evening service from 8:15 p.m. to 6:30 p.m.

The idea is to gather at 6 o'clock for appetizers and wine, followed by a service that will last less than an hour. A congregational Shabbat dinner will be held after the service a couple of times a month.

"The problem is that attendance at Erev Shabbat services has been consistently low, except for special events like bar and bat mitzvahs. It is usually around 40 people, mainly seniors, and members under 50 are not coming," says Rabbi Phil Cohen, now entering his second year as spiritual leader of Anshe Sholom.

He believes the earlier service time, coupled with light refreshments beforehand and periodic dinners afterward, will encourage younger couples with children to bring their kids and enjoy Shabbat together.

He said temple president Steve Dembe and past-president Lorraine Cohen held brainstorming sessions with some younger members and learned that they wanted participation, lots of singable music and a consistent early time to make it possible for children to come and participate.

The program is being launched with the name "Shabbat: Fully Loaded!" and will feature a complimentary dinner hosted by the congregation.

Rabbi Cohen said he plans to make his "award-winning chicken soup," with a recipe handed down from his great-grandmother.

Not to be outdone, temple educator Laura Wolfson will prepare a vegetarian soup that's been handed down from generations of dedicated vegetarians.

The service will feature Grade 1 and 2 students from the temple's religious school, who will sing some of the prayers, such as the Shema and Barchu. Their parents will also be honoured on the bimah. Once each month, a different grade of the religious school will participate in the service.

"We hope that the service will be attractive to the entire community. We will offer a service filled with song. People will be asked to participate. Our goal is to find a balance of forms that will enable everyone to feel comfortable in the sanctuary," Rabbi Cohen said in a message to temple members.

"Ultimately it's about community. We hope that this new service time will provide a moment in the week when more of us can gather to worship together, to usher in Shabbat together, simply to be together."

He added that the dark fall and winter nights have discouraged many people from coming to services.

Wolfson, who has just taken on cantorial duties at the temple in addition to her role as educator, is excited about the change.

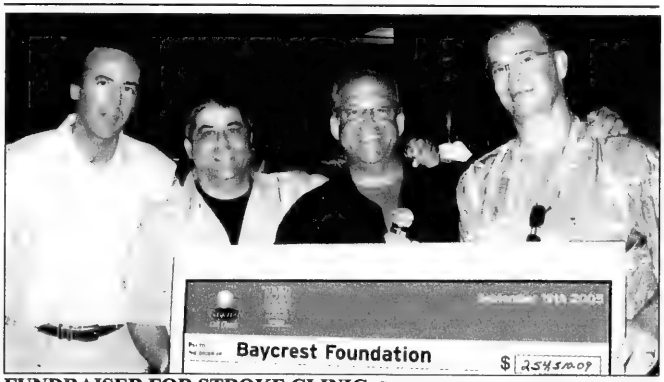
"I want to raise my four-year-old daughter to be a shul-goer, and it's difficult with the present hours," she says. "I believe young couples will start to come, and bring their children."

As for seniors who form the current attendance base, Wolfson said it may take time for them to get used to the change, but she believes that a livelier and more participatory service will attract all age groups.

Whether the new shorter service format will have a formal sermon is still up in the air, but there will be a learning component to every service, Rabbi Cohen said.

The temple's board of directors has approved the new hours, although a previous experiment with earlier hours met with only mixed success, attributed to the fact there was confusion about the time of services, some of which began early and others relatively late.

The present experiment will continue until late March. Saturday morning services continue to start at 11:40 a.m.



FUNDRAISER FOR STROKE CLINIC: Seventy-two Toronto golfers came out earlier this fall to the picturesque Devil's Pulpit golf course in Caledon, Ont., to participate in Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's 16th annual Golf Classic, called Strokes Fore Stroke. The full-day tournament raised a record of almost $260,000 for Baycrest's new stroke and cognition clinic, one of its Brain Health Centre Clinics. Couple starts scholarship fund in rabbi's memory

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Although Rabbi Irwin Witty left here more than 35 years ago, the former principal of the city's Talmud Torah Elementary School and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate is still remembered fondly by many in Winnipeg's Jewish community.

Orah and Soody Kleiman were old friends of Rabbi Witty, who died July 30 in Toronto at age 73, and in his memory, they have established the Rabbi Witty Jewish Education Scholarship Fund, to be adminstered by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

Rabbi Irwin Witty

It will provide funding for students who want to attend the Gray Academy of Jewish Education but whose parents may not be able to afford the minimum $750 a year in tuition. (Children of immigrants can attend for free in their first year in Winnipeg. There are free Hebrew programs in two Winnipeg public elementary schools, but Gray Academy, which runs from junior kindergarten to Grade 12, is the main option for Jewish education after Grade 6.)

"We were considering something like this in any case to help children whose parents couldn't afford to give them a Jewish education," said Orah Kleiman, a retired teacher and former president of Na'amat in Winnipeg.

"When we learned of Rabbi Witty's passing, this seemed like an appropriate way to remember him. He always believed that no child should be denied a Jewish education because the parents couldn't afford to pay. He was constantly looking for benefactors to help pay for those children to enrol at school."

Marsha Cowan, the Jewish Foundation's executive director, described the Kleimans as "incredible role models."

"We are delighted by their gift," she said. "It was such an honourable thing to do. It helps us focus on what we can do to ensure a Jewish education for all those who want it."

The Kleimans were not only parents of children at Talmud Torah, they were also personal friends of Rabbi Irwin and Shulamis Witty when the Wittys lived in Winnipeg from 1962 to 1969.

"[The Wittys] were the same age as the parents when they started here," Orah said. "Our older sons started school together."

Soody, an electrician by profession and chair of the elementary school's PTA while Rabbi Witty was principal, recalls how the rabbi was the first to introduce classes for day school parents.

"He had a broader education, with degrees in music and general studies from Columbia University," Soody said of Rabbi Witty, an Orthodox rabbi who received his smichah from Yeshiva University.

"He also had an accepting attitude. He realized that many of the parents didn't have much in the way of knowledge of Judaism. He spoke on topics such as the Jewish attitude to work and family relationships."

The Kleimans said they're hopeful the new fund will attract donations from people their age whose children attended the schools when Rabbi Witty was principal. They also hope former students will give to the fund.

Cowan said there have already been several inquiries from potential contributors. "We are putting a priority on promoting this fund," she said. "We think it is going to make a real difference on a long-term basis."

The Kleimans said they're content to leave it to Gray Academy to decide exactly how interest from the fund will be allocated.

Kirshenblatt-Gimblett also presented examples of a family who had a bar mitzvah for their dog and chassidic reggae artist Mattissiyahu. She described it as nostalgia with a twist. This new culture, which helps to form a community, could not exist without technology and more precisely, the Internet, she said.

Following Kirshenblatt-Gimblett's talk, Rebbetzin Hadassah Gross, described in the program as "the reigning queen of neo-chassidic Judeo kitsch," performed a Storahtelling program called The Rebbetzin's Tisch.

This particular Rebbetzin, however, would stick out like a sore thumb in a crowd of Jewish bubbies. She is much taller, more muscular and broader than any rabbi's wife we may know.

This Shabbat drag queen also sports an Adam's apple. She dresses entirely in white, including a shimmering sequined suit, gloves, high heels and a cream coloured bouffant-style wig.

In her Storahtelling performance – a combination of storytelling and Torah – she discussed Shabbat preparations, weekly rituals and the joy she feels every time the sun goes down on Friday evening.

The crowd clearly showed their enjoyment of the rebbetzin's edgy and comical interpretation of the Shabbat queen but also made them consider certain issues, such as whether Judaism should be more inclusive.

The following night featured Queer Jewish Weddings, a sold-out world-premiere performance concert that explores various aspects of queer Jewish weddings.

Hadassah-WIZO leader to be honoured at convention

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

When Lily Frank steps up to the podium to accept the Rebecca Sieff Award during Canadian Hadassah-WIZO's national convention in Vancouver Nov. 19 to 23 it will bring back memories of a career that began 50 years ago at the side of the great British Zionist leader.

"Rebecca Sieff was more than a mentor to me; I absorbed history through her and was infected with her passion for Israel. I felt connected to the early pioneers and struggles for the state, through her eyes," said Frank, who became secretary-general in 1956 of World WIZO, of which Sieff was founder and president.

Sieff spent about half the year in Israel, and Frank became her "right hand." She was awed by her determination and originality, including her unorthodox belief at the time in women's equality.

Frank's time with World WIZO led to what would truly become her life's work: the professional leadership of its sister organization in Canada.

In 1965, Frank accepted an offer from Neri Bloomfield to work for CHW. So began a 40-year career with the organization that ended in April. Frank is regarded by many as the doyenne of Canadian Jewish communal professionals.

Frank started as director of its Montreal council, creating 13 chapters in her first year. She was soon promoted to national executive director and, in 1978, was appointed to the new position of national executive vice-president.

Frank served under 11 presidents, saw the organization grow to the largest Jewish women's volunteer organization in Canada, developed its Orah magazine into a substantive journal, and moved its fundraising activities into the major leagues, creating donor categories of an unheard-of $25,000 or more, raising close to $3 million in eight years for social projects in Israel.

But Frank's most meaningful moments were among the organization's devoted rank-and-file members, especially those in communities so small that often there were more non-Jewish volunteers working on the bazaar than Jewish. In these towns, mainly in the Maritimes and the Prairies, she found spirited, warm-hearted people, who inspired her. Their gradual disappearance as the young moved away has been sad for her.

She enjoyed sharing Israel's story with Canadian politicians and public figures like Flora MacDonald and the late Judy LaMarsh, both of whom she considers friends. Frank also cultivated many international connections, and one person who stands out for her graciousness and charm is Jihan Sadat, wife of the late Egyptian leader.

Frank thrilled CHW mission members in 1980 when she arranged for all 47 of them to be guests of Mrs. Sadat at the presidential residence in Cairo. Mrs. Sadat later agreed to speak at a CHW conference in Toronto and stunned everyone when she showed up to pay her respects at the shivah following the sudden death of the local president's father.

Frank says she liked to bring an element of surprise or the unusual to anything she organized, to give members something to remember: an unscheduled celebrity at an event or a detour on an Israel mission, for example. She surprised participants in a conference once by getting through by phone (she is fluent in Russian) to refusenik Ida Nudel at her Siberian exile.

As large as Frank's redoubtable personality loomed in CHW, she always observed a "fine, but distinct line" between professional and volunteer leadership. "The professional should bring creativity, imagination, dynamism and passion, but the volunteers make the decisions and they represent the organization.

"I showed loyalty throughout my career with CHW and was at the side of every president without exception, because when the president looks good, the entire organization looks good," said Frank, who has now embarked on a new career as regional director of the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University for Eastern Canada.

"I'm not a big believer in retirement," said Frank, who appears to have lost none of her energy.

As seriously as she takes the role of the professional, Frank cherishes what another mentor of hers – Saul Hayes, Canadian Jewish Congress executive vice-president – said of her at a 1979 State of Israel Bonds testimonial: "What endears me so much to you is that you are strictly an amateur. You do what you do for the sheer love of it, and not because it is your professional duty."

Born in Shanghai to Russian parents, Frank was brought up in a Zionist home. At age six, Frank joined the Betar Zionist youth movement. Before emigrating to Israel in 1949, Franks served as honorary secretary to the Israeli consul to Shanghai, Moshe Yuval.

Other CHW highlights for Frank include attending the United Nations Decade for Women conferences in Copenhagen in 1980 and Nairobi in 1985, where she confronted the many delegates who denounced Israel.

Job seekers find Winnipeg fair positive

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — One of Winnipeg's major challenges in attracting younger people and retaining them is finding them good jobs.

Last year, as part of a new effort to reverse the four-decade long decline in the city's Jewish population, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, through its Grow Winnipeg initiative, held a job fair for both newcomers to the community and home-grown young people.

It was intended to be a one-time event, but it was so successful that Grow Winnipeg decided to make the "JFWjobexchange" an annual occurrence, holding this year's event Oct. 27 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Aimed at reversing decline in city's Jewish population

"Last year, we had 89 job seekers sign in," says Cliff Huot, placement consultant for the Grow Winnipeg Initiative. "This year, we had 120 registered."

Among the nearly 30 businesses and organizations with tables this year – compared to less than 20 last year – were banks, computer companies, financial services firms, trucking companies, a major clothing manufacturer, the City of Winnipeg and the Manitoba Civil Service Commission.

Julian Dinenzon, who came to Winnipeg last spring from Argentina – a key source of recent Jewish newcomers – attended the evening event. He has a degree in science and marketing administration and was working in management at a science-related company in Buenos Aires before he left.

He's currently participating in a work experience program at Scotiabank and said he would like to continue to work in banking. He said he was able to pick up some leads and make some appointments through the job fair.

Alicia Kaminetzky came here in May from Argentina, where she worked in a variety of sales and management jobs, and as a translator.

"I'm just browsing here," she said as she visited different tables. "I'm not sure yet what kind of work I want to do. This is a very good program, though."

Michael Zuskin came to Winnipeg three months ago from Israel. Originally from Ukraine, he had been living in Ashdod for 12 years.

"I am looking for work as a computer programmer or software developer," he said. "This program is a good idea."

Huot said he tries to stay in contact with registrants and keep track of how they're doing.

"We try to have the participants fill in evaluation forms after," he said. "Last year, of the 23 participant evaluations returned, 19 said the evening met their expectations, 22 said they would attend future events, and 22 said would recommend the program to a friend."

All of this year's survey respondents reported making positive contacts.

Parizeau's Jewish connection

Guest Voice

By SALLY F. ZERKER

Oct. 30 was the 10th anniversary of the Quebec referendum when the "no" side won by a hair, only by roughly one per cent of the vote. It was also the anniversary of the address by the premier of Quebec, Jacques Parizeau, to the crowd of disappointed separatists – some crying, some fuming, some numb – with his now-famous explanation for that loss. "It's true we have been defeated," he told them, "but basically by what? By money and the ethnic vote."

That statement was a shock to many people, but more so to Jews in Canada, because it suggested that Parizeau was targeting the Jews of Montreal who voted almost a hundred per cent against separation. The combination of money and ethnicity appeared to be a euphemism for Jews.

Jacques Parizeau

A couple of years after the referendum had taken place, I accidentally learned that Parizeau himself had a close personal connection to Jews. In sum, and to my amazement, it turns out that Parizeau's two children are Jews, if only in accordance with halachic interpretation.

My story begins one evening when my husband and I were invited to meet Irene, the bride of a friend of ours named Peter. Irene is a stunningly attractive woman, a successful businesswoman, vibrant and full of energy for a woman who had passed the age of 70. Or so I learned over cocktails at her charming home in Florida.

In the course of our conversations, having learned that my husband and I were Canadians, Irene began to ask me questions about Jacques Parizeau, about the Parti Québécois and about the referendum. She wasn't merely raising questions; she seemed to know a great deal about matters concerning Quebec. So much so, that I was amazed. How come, I wondered, when most Americans know practically nothing about Canadian politics and can rarely name the prime minister of Canada, Irene was cognizant of the premier of a Canadian province and much more. I put that question to Irene. It was then that she told me this incredible and interesting story.

Irene and her cousin, Alice, were young, Jewish Poles when Hitler invaded Poland. Together they averted the horrors of the concentration camps and survived by passing themselves off as Christian girls. That Irene could successfully so disguise herself was not too surprising, at least on the basis of her blond colouring and blue eyes. I presumed that her cousin was similarly endowed.

When the war was over, the two of them made their way to Paris. Irene had expectations to migrate to the United States because her brother had fortunately been stranded there while working on the 1939 New York World's Fair and was by then an American. Her cousin at that point was not eligible for sponsorship by her brother.

Alice enrolled in the Sorbonne, where she flourished and where she met a Canadian who asked her to marry him. He arranged for her to follow him to Canada, which she did. However, she decided not to marry that original admirer, but instead she met and married Jacques Parizeau, a young, bright student of economics.

Having seen and heard Parizeau on that fateful night when he blamed money and ethnics, I had to ask the obvious question. "Did Parizeau know that Alice was Jewish?" Of course, I was assured. And do their son and daughter know that their mother, who had died in 1990, was a Jew? Again, Irene stated positively that they did, because they were in contact with Irene and her own children, their cousins, who definitely identify themselves as Jews. After all, said Irene, we are Alice's only remaining family. Alice's family died in Bergen-Belsen.

Does Irene's account check out with official biographies of Alice Parizeau? Not if you look only at French versions which never mention her Jewish origin. One English encyclopedia includes the information that she was a "Jewish writer." In fact, Alice Parizeau had a brilliant career as civil servant, journalist and novelist. She was famous in her own right and was the recipient of many honours, including the Order of Canada.

But there seems to be some confusion in the French bios about her history through the war years. It is claimed in these that she was interned in Bergen-Belsen after the Germans invaded Warsaw and that she survived that internment. The English bio says only that her father, a wealthy industrialist, died in Bergen-Belsen. There is no mention here that Alice herself was sent to the concentration camp.

Whatever the truth about her whereabouts in those terrible years, there is no doubt that Alice Poznanska Parizeau was born a Jew. I believe that she abandoned her Jewish roots in the course of her life. I say that because I learned that when she died there was a prominent and public funeral held in Montreal under the auspices of the Catholic Church. That suggests to me that her children's upbringing was in all likelihood in the Catholic tradition. Nevertheless, Jacques Parizeau had enough exposure through Irene and her family to be sensitive that language that reflects hostility to Jews can do harm, and he therefore should have known how his attack on "money and ethnics" might be seen by Jews in Canada.

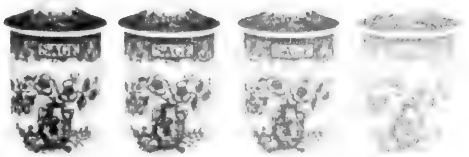
Food, Scrumptious Food

Elegance for any special occasion

By NORENE GILLETZ



Concern about what to serve family and friends on special occasions is a major topic of conversation for many people I know. If you are faced with the challenge of preparing a special meal, here are some terrific offerings from a new cookbook, Crowning Elegance: A Kosher Culinary Experience, a fundraising project of Arie Crown Hebrew Day School in Skokie, Ill. For ordering information, call 847-626-7747 or visit www.crowningelegance.com.

This hard-cover book with wipe-clean pages is a unique compilation of extraordinary dishes, with nearly 300 recipes, many with wine recommendations. It also features 180 fabulous colour photographs (including step-by-step directions on how to braid a six-strand challah). There is also a helpful index of recipes with 15 minutes or less prep time.

If you're looking for a recipe for chicken soup, matzah balls or kugel, you won't find it in Crowning Elegance. Recipes include crowd-pleasers such as Chicken and Pastrami in Pastry, Fragrant Persian Rice and Poached Pears Stuffed with Chocolate Sauce. There are interesting variations of old favourites, like Spicy Gefilte Fish in Tomato Sauce, Seven-Grain Challah and Lazy Texas Brisket.

"We didn't want to include recipes that everyone who keeps kosher already has," said editor Valerie Kanter, a Brooklyn native and mother of five whose Syrian background inspired her passion for cooking and entertaining. "We're getting a positive response from all directions, including Israel, Japan and Canada! My 12-year old son and his classmates are all cooking from the book!"

The recipes below are excellent for any celebration. If you are making a turkey, don't forget to save the carcass and use it for this amazing chowder. It was a big hit when it was served at the photo shoot. The photographer loved it!

TURKEY CHOWDER

Be prepared to offer second helpings of this soup. You may find yourself making turkey just so you can have the leftovers for this crowd pleasing recipe.

Stock:
1 roasted turkey carcass, meat removed
1 large onion, quartered
2 ribs celery
1 tsp. fresh rubbed sage
1 tsp. allspice
2 tsp. poultry seasoning
8 cups chicken broth
1 cup non-dairy creamer

Soup:
2 tbsp. sweet unsalted margarine
1 large onion, chopped
4 medium sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into ½-inch chunks
10 oz. frozen, canned or fresh corn kernels
3 to 4 cups diced, cooked turkey salt and black pepper to taste
chives or scallions, chopped for garnish

Stock: Break carcass into pieces to fit in an 8-quart stock pot. Place over medium-high heat. Add onion, celery, sage, allspice, poultry seasoning, chicken broth and non-dairy creamer. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer, covered, for about 2 hours. Strain stock into a large pot.

Soup: In an 8-quart stock pot over medium heat, melt margarine. Add onion and sweet potatoes. Cook, stirring until onions are transparent, about 10 minutes. Raise heat to high, add stock and bring to a boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer until sweet potatoes mash easily, about 20 minutes. Mash potatoes coarsely with a fork. Add corn and turkey. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Cook through until turkey is heated. Garnish individual servings with chives or scallions. Serves 10.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I often find myself snacking in the evening and feel that this is making it hard for me to lose weight. How can I be less hungry at night?

A. This is a common problem. The first and most important thing to establish is, are you truly hungry at that time or are you eating out of habit? Many people find that at this time of the day, things are winding down and a reward seems appropriate in the form of food. Or you are watching TV or reading, and snacking from habit.

The first step to stopping the behaviour is to ask yourself the question, "Am I hungry enough to eat a piece of fruit?" If you are standing in your kitchen at 9 p.m. and answer yes, then you probably are really hungry, likely because you didn't eat breakfast or it wasn't a "good" breakfast, or possibly because you haven't eaten enough food or enough good quality food throughout the day.

If, conversely, the answer is no and you feel like eating cookies, cake, chocolate, chips or cheese and crackers, then you are eating for other reasons and whatever you eat at this time will likely contribute to weight gain.

So what do you do to break this habit?

• Remove yourself from the kitchen. Go upstairs, go for a walk, take a bath, but get away from the kitchen and temptation.

• At this point, it is probably your hands, eyes, mouth and brain that make you feel you want to eat, and not your stomach. You need something that will take a long time to eat to turn off all of these senses. The best solution is a hot drink because it can't be consumed quickly, and in the 10 to 15 minutes it takes to drink it, you will likely satisfy all the senses. A cookie, on the other hand, will be devoured in 10 seconds or less and send you back for seconds and thirds. The hot drink can be tea, coffee, herbal tea, diet hot chocolate or another diet drink, or clear soup.

• The most important of all possible tips is, do not sabotage yourself. Get tempting food out of the house. We all, myself included, have foods that call our name and are too tempting to avoid, and it is much easier to avoid these for a brief moment in the grocery store than repeatedly in our kitchen. If you want to be successful, you need to rid your home of these little gems. Trust me, you'll be glad you did.

Q. If hunger late at night is a result of a poor breakfast or of not eating breakfast, what should I have?

A. I always tell my patients that I believe everyone has a "magic" breakfast. The definition of your magic breakfast is one that is healthy and balanced, is something you enjoy and is convenient, and most importantly, one that keeps you feeling full and satisfied for several hours until lunch. I also believe that this breakfast is different for everyone.

For example, steel cut oatmeal (or any oatmeal) is a great complex carbohydrate, has tremendous health benefits and is therefore a great breakfast, but I get very hungry midmorning when I eat oatmeal. So while I do recommend it to patients and many do very well on it, it isn't my magic breakfast.

When you are constructing your magic breakfast, you want to try to combine protein with complex carbs. Protein sources include dairy, meat, fish, poultry, eggs (the whites), soy, nuts and legumes. So you could have whole grain cereal with milk, yogurt with high fibre cereal or nuts, or an egg with whole wheat or rye toast, for example. You can also add fruit if you wish.

CLASSIC ROAST TURKEY

A basic delicious turkey. Carving the turkey in advance and reheating in gravy ensures the turkey will be moist.

1 (12 to 17-lb.) whole fresh turkey
1 large red Delicious apple, washed, dried and cored
½ cup olive oil
salt to taste
2 to 3 tsp. black pepper
1½ tbsp. garlic powder
2 tbsp. paprika
1 tsp. dried rosemary
2 large Spanish onions, sliced into rings
⅓ cup orange juice

Preheat oven to 350. Place apple in cavity of turkey. Rub oil all over turkey. Sprinkle with salt, black pepper, garlic powder, paprika and rosemary.

Lay onion slices on bottom of a large roasting pan. Place turkey, breast side up on top of onions. Pour orange juice around turkey. Cover tightly with aluminum foil. Roast for about 3 to 5 hours or until meat thermometer placed in thickest part of breast, not touching bone, reads 180 F. Remove foil and baste turkey with pan juices. Cook uncovered for an additional 20 minutes to brown. Let cool before carving.

Preheat oven to 350. After turkey is carved, return to roasting pan and spoon gravy and onions on top of turkey. Reseal with aluminum foil. Reheat for approximately 25 minutes before serving. Serves 12.

SCRUMPTIOUS SAGE STUFFING

Using fresh sage and fresh breadcrumbs gives this cornbread stuffing an edge that sets it apart from a standard stuffing. It can be prepared a day in advance and kept covered in refrigerator. When ready to cook bring to room temperature before baking.

Cornbread:
non-stick cooking spray
½ cup flour
⅛ cup yellow cornmeal
¼ tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
½ cup non-dairy creamer or soy milk, mixed with ½ tbsp. vinegar
1 egg
⅛ cup margarine, melted and cooled
¼ tsp. finely chopped fresh sage, optional

Stuffing:
8 cups course fresh breadcrumbs, a mixture from several types of bread approximately 4 cups coarsely crumbled cornbread
¼ cup finely chopped fresh flat leaf parsley
3 tbsp. finely chopped fresh sage
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. black pepper
1 cup margarine
2 medium onions, finely chopped
2 medium ribs celery, finely chopped
2 eggs lightly beaten
1 cup chicken or turkey broth
½ cup high-fat content original soy milk
non-stick cooking spray

Cornbread: Preheat oven to 425. Prepare a greased (9 x 5 x 3-inch) loaf pan with non-stick cooking spray. In a medium bowl, combine flour, cornmeal, baking powder, baking soda and salt.

In a large bowl, combine non-dairy creamer with vinegar, egg, melted margarine and sage. Add dry ingredients to wet ingredients. Mix until just combined.

Spread into prepared loaf pan. Bake until golden, about 20 minutes. Cool in pan on a wire rack then coarsely crumble.

Stuffing: Preheat oven to 325. Prepare a well greased (9 x 13 x 2-inch) baking dish.

Spread breadcrumbs onto 2 (15 x 10-inch) jelly-roll pans. Place in oven for about 15 minutes. Let cool. Transfer to a large bowl. Stir in parsley, sage, salt and pepper.

In a large skillet over medium heat, melt margarine. Add onions and sauté for about 5 minutes. Add celery and cook for an additional 5 minutes. Remove from heat and add to breadcrumb mixture. Add eggs, broth and soy milk. Toss well.

Pour contents of large bowl into prepared baking dish. Bake covered in oven, which is still at 325, for 30 minutes. Uncover and bake an additional 30 minutes until well browned. Serves 10.

SHERRY GLAZED GRAPE TART WITH PECAN CRUST

This picture perfect tart is made with a pecan crust. The dough is simply pushed into a fluted tart pan, ideal for those who prefer not to roll out dough.

Crust:
¼ cup pecans, lightly toasted at 350 for 5 minutes, cooled
¼ cup brown sugar
1 cup flour
½ cup margarine cut into ½-inch slices
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. ground ginger
¼ tsp. salt

Filling:
½ cup sherry
1 cup grape jelly
½ tsp. lemon juice
2 to 3 pounds small red seedless grapes, washed, dried and stems discarded

Crust: Grease a (10-inch) round, fluted tart pan, with a removable bottom.

In the bowl of a food processor, process together the pecans and brown sugar. Pulse until finely ground but not a paste. Add flour, margarine, cinnamon, ginger and salt. Pulse until combined with large clumps.

Turn mixture out onto a clean work surface. Knead for 2 minutes to form a dough. Press dough into tart pan, on bottom and up the sides. Chill for 30 minutes.

Preheat oven to 350. Locate oven rack to lower third of oven. Bake crust until golden brown, about 25 minutes. Cool completely on a wire rack. When cooled carefully remove sides of pan.

Filling: In a small saucepan over medium heat, combine sherry and jelly. Stir occasionally. Reduce to 1 cup, about 25 minutes. Remove from heat and stir in lemon juice. Reserve 2 tablespoons of glaze for drizzling over completed tart.

In a large bowl combine sherry mixture, minus 2 tbsp., with grapes until grapes are well coated. Pour coated grapes into prepared shell.

Talks with PA off if Hamas runs in elections: Sharon

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said on Monday that Israel is vehemently opposed to Hamas' participation in the upcoming Palestinian legislative elections.

Speaking before the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, Sharon said if Hamas participate in the Jan. 25 Palestinian elections, Israel would not hold joint meetings with Palestinians, and would make it difficult for Hamas members to campaign freely.

Sharon also said that if Hamas is allowed to participate in the elections, there will be no lifting of military restrictions on the territories in the run-up to the vote.

"We will continue with our policy regarding Hamas and those [Hamas members] who walk around freely in the streets will be deported.

"Nevertheless, Israel has no intention of disrupting elections in the PA," Sharon said.

In the past, the two sides have met to negotiate Palestinian prisoner releases, the hand-over of West Bank towns to Palestinian control, and a variety of other issues.

The Palestinians say that Israel Defense Forces checkpoints throughout the West Bank must be lifted ahead of the election to allow candidates to campaign freely and to permit voters to travel to rallies and the polls.

Ariel Sharon

Turning to Syria, Sharon told the committee that he will not negotiate with Syria on the return of the Golan Heights, panel chairman Yuval Steinitz said.

"I don't intend to enter negotiations with Syria because I don't want to withdraw from the Golan Heights," Steinitz quoted Sharon as saying.

The lawmakers were discussing a UN commission's efforts to question senior Syrian officials in connection with the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Israel should not extend its hand to Syria when the nation's leaders are isolated internationally, said Steinitz.

Hamas trying to set up in West Bank: IDF

By GIDEON ALON and AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

The head of the Israel Defence Forces' (IDF) intelligence research division, Brig.-Gen. Yossi Kuperwasser, said Monday that Hamas is making intensive efforts to transfer terror technology and weapons from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank.

Kuperwasser told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee about a recent attempt by three Qassam rocket experts to make their way from Gaza to the West Bank.

The three members of the Popular Resistance Committees, a Hamas "subcontractor," infiltrated Israel via Egypt with the goal of reaching Jenin and setting up a Qassam rocket workshop there. Security forces, however, captured the three near Mitzpe Ramon.

The IDF believes that Hamas' relative restraint over the past week, even after Israel killed its operative Fawzi al-Qara, is related to Syria's desire to avoid escalation right now.

Therefore, instead of a direct clash with Israel, the organization is trying to operate indirectly, for example, by sending operatives from Gaza to the West Bank to heat up the atmosphere there.

In addition, official Jordanian sources on Sunday confirmed an earlier report in Ha'aretz that senior Hamas officials sought to transfer its operations from Damascus to Amman.

The sources said Jordan rebuffed the Hamas attempt and said it was not prepared to host a non-Jordanian movement in its territory. Jordan's condition for the Hamas officials to return to Amman was that they would renounce their membership in the organization.

Hamas, which also reportedly sought to move operations to Egypt, examined whether either country would be willing to allow the organization's headquarters to relocate there.

The inquiries were made because Hamas believes that Syria, where both Hamas and Islamic Jihad headquarters are located, may force both organizations to leave, in an effort to divert growing international pressure sparked by a United Nations investigation into the murder of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Hamas' political leadership has been headquartered in Damascus for years. The offices also house operations officers who deliver instructions and money to Hamas operatives in the territories. The same is true of Islamic Jihad's Damascus offices. Officially, however, Syria describes both headquarters as "public relations offices."

Under heavy American pressure following Hamas and Islamic Jihad terror attacks in Israel, Syria claimed two years ago that it had shut down both offices. In reality, however, both organizations still operate out of Damascus.

Hamas' inquiries to Egypt and Jordan are additional proof of the pressure Syria has been under since UN investigators concluded that senior officials were apparently involved in Hariri's murder. This pressure is being spearheaded by the United States and France; the former is also angry over Damascus' role in allowing terrorists to enter Iraq from Syria. Damascus evidently hopes that expelling Hamas and Islamic Jihad will appease the UN, the United States and France.

In the past, Hamas preferred to operate out of Jordan, but in 1999, King Abdullah expelled several senior organization officials from the country. They were relocated to Syria and Qatar.

Egypt maintains close ties with Hamas, partly to maintain its role as chief mediator between the Palestinian Authority and Islamic organizations. However, it apparently draws the line at hosting the headquarters of an organization that Israel, the United States and the European Union all label a terrorist group.

Meanwhile, Syria's crisis is already affecting the relationship between the Islamic organizations' headquarters and their operatives in the territories. Israeli security sources said that in recent months, the Damascus offices have made major efforts to lower the profile of their relationship with operatives in the West Bank and Gaza.

In February, when Islamic Jihad carried out a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv that killed five people, Israel was able to give western governments intelligence information showing that the West Bank cell that sent the bomber had been in contact with Islamic Jihad headquarters in Damascus. Recently, however, the modus operandi has changed, and sources say it now more closely resembles that of Al Qaeda and other "global jihad" organizations: headquarters in Damascus sets guidelines, such as a general time frame for an attack or the general area where it should take place, but the local operatives decide on the details.

This system distances the Syrian government – which hosts the headquarters – from accusations of direct involvement in terrorism. It also makes it harder for Israeli intelligence to obtain advance warning of an attack. Moreover, at a time when the PA and Islamic organizations are both officially committed to a period of calm, it serves both sides if the organizations refrain from officially claiming responsibility for attacks.

Six Israelis receive organs of Palestinian boy

By AMOS HAREL and ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The vital organs of a Palestinian boy mistakenly killed by the Israel Defense Forces last week have been transplanted into the bodies of six Israelis, after the boy's family donated his organs "for the sake of peace between peoples," Israel Radio reported.

Ahmed al-Khatib, 12, was fatally shot during clashes in Jenin, when IDF troops mistook the toy gun he carried for a real rifle.

Three Israeli girls, two Jewish and one Druze, underwent surgery Sunday to receive Al-Khatib's lungs, heart and liver. Twelve-year-old Samah Gadban had been waiting for a heart for five years when doctors called her family late Saturday and told them of the Al-Khatib donation. By Sunday afternoon, the Druze girl had a new heart and was recovering at Schneider Children's Medical Center in Petah Tikvah.

"This morning, I did not know anything about the boy. I only knew that the doctors said they had a heart," said Samah's father, Riad. "I don't know what to say. It is such a gesture of love... I would like for [the family] to think that my daughter is their daughter."

Jamal al-Khatib said he hoped to meet the recipients of his son's organs to ensure that they were healthy, and added: "The most important thing is that I see the person who received the organs, to see him alive."

The boy's liver was divided into two and given to a six-month-old baby and a 56-year-old woman; his kidneys were given to a five-year-old boy; and his lungs were given to a five-year-old boy and a four-year-old girl, the radio said.

Dr. Tzvi Ben-Yishai, spokesperson for Rambam Medical Center in Haifa, where Al-Khatib had been treated, said the boy's parents decided to donate his organs "to bring hearts closer and bring peace closer."

Jamal al-Khatib, the boy's father, said, "I don't mind seeing the organs in an Israeli or a Palestinian. In our religion, God allows us to give organs to another person and it doesn't matter who the person is." He added that he hoped the donations would send a message of peace to Israelis and Palestinians.

"I had an older brother who suffered from kidney failure," he told Channel 2, "and there were no transplants available. When the doctor told me that my boy was clinically dead, I remembered my brother."

The incident involving Ahmed occurred when soldiers entered Jenin Thursday as part of an ongoing operation to arrest Islamic Jihad operatives. Shots were fired at the soldiers and teenagers threw rocks at their jeeps.

The soldiers thought they saw an armed man some 130 metres away, and one of them fired, hitting the suspect in the head. When the soldiers approached, they found Ahmed laying critically injured – with a toy gun. The IDF subsequently circulated photos of the gun to show how realistic it looked.

He was taken to the hospital in Ramallah, but later transferred to Haifa. He died late Saturday and his parents quickly agreed to donate his organs.

Volunteer program for seniors in Netanya

By PAUL SHINDMAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A unique program in Israel offers Canadian snowbirds the option of a combined vacation/volunteer visit in the sunny seaside resort of Netanya.

The Gideon Program has been running successfully in Netanya for almost 20 years, program director Edit Cohen said in an interview.

The program's information says it "forges a strong link between Israel and the Diaspora which is not based on monetary donations but is based on living in Israel and working with ordinary Israelis."

Cohen said dozens of volunteers come away every year with a new personal connection to Israel and the Jewish people.

The program starts in December for one or two months, and participants can volunteer at places including special schools, the library for the blind or Laniado Hospital. Visitors stay in local hotels and volunteer in the morning four days a week. Afternoon activities include learning Hebrew, Israeli folkdancing, tours, theatre visits and concerts.

Weekends are free and traditional Shabbat meals are arranged with local families. The last section of the program includes trips around the country. This year's itinerary includes visits to Kibbutz Lavi, the Dead Sea and Jerusalem.

Cohen has dozens of e-mails from seniors who continue to keep in touch. She told of a man from Pennsylvania who was talked into coming by his neighbours two years ago. He knew he was Jewish, but had no background in Judaism. He was so enthralled to learn about his roots during his trip that last summer he brought his kids and grandchildren back to Israel.

"The program is very personal," Cohen said. "We get connections with people who live here. We try to take the volunteers to places that, as regular tourists, they would not visit.

"I try to get them to know the people of Israel, not just the places. As a tourist they see the places but don't meet Israelis. [And] they are looked after all the time. Even if they decide to go to a philharmonic concert, we send a madrichah [guide] with them. There is a doctor on call and the care is very good."

Cohen said the Gideon Program is connected to the large English-speaking community in Netanya. and matches are made with local synagogues and activities of the local chapter of the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI).

The program is named after its founder, Cohen's father Gideon Shiponi. The first child born in the then-fledgling settlement of Netanya, Shiponi was an army commander who served under Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and eventually became director of the Tour V'aleh department of the Jewish Agency responsible for bringing young Diaspora Jews to Israel.

"He was a real lover of this country," Cohen said. "He thought, why bring only children [to visit Israel], why not adults?"

Cohen said many of the seniors are first-timers in Israel who end up learning more about their roots and the people they come from. It gets passed on to the next generations because "when their kids and grandchildren see that they have been here and they hear their experiences, they also get interested." Cohen said.

For information, go to the Gideon Program website www.gideonprogram.com or e-mail Cohen at editcohen@netscape.net.

Free-wheel through Israel

Israel is paving a cross-country bicycle trail. The 625-mile, largely off-road Israeli bike trail will run from Metulla in the north to Eilat in the south. Under a decision made by the Israel Nature and National Parks Protection Authority, the project is to be completed within 10 years. The final route will take in Jewish National Fund forests and important cultural and archeological sites, but will not run through the West Bank, officials said.

Condoleezza Rice to visit

Condoleezza Rice was scheduled to visit Israel and the West Bank this week. The U.S. secretary of state was to depart Nov. 10 to meet with Israeli and Palestinian leaders to advance the peace process now that Israel has completed its withdrawal from Gaza. A top agenda item will be passage between Gaza, Israel, the West Bank and the rest of the world, said Rice's spokesperson, Sean McCormack. Rice will "address some of the concerns that the Palestinians" have, McCormack said. Rice has told Jewish and Israeli leaders that she wants to strengthen Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas ahead of January legislative elections, when he faces a challenge from radical Islamist parties.

Mofaz to Rice: we won't disrupt PA elections

Israel's defence minister assured Condoleezza Rice that Israel would not interfere in Palestinian elections. Shaul Mofaz met the U.S. secretary of state last week ahead of her visit next week to the region. Israeli leaders earlier had said they would not "facilitate" the elections if Hamas or other terror groups take part. "We will not interfere in the Palestinian election, but we don't believe that Hamas should be part of the Palestinian Parliament," Mofaz told reporters.

Hamas kills soldier

Hamas gunmen shot dead an Israeli soldier last Wednesday during an army raid on Jenin in which an Islamic Jihad terrorist was arrested. Hamas claimed responsibility for the killing. In the Gaza Strip, terrorists fired a rocket and mortar bomb across the border at Israel, but caused no damage.

Israel reopens New Zealand embassy

Israel is reopening its embassy in New Zealand three years after it closed due to budget cuts. Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom made the announcement at a meeting in Jerusalem when Jan Henderson presented her credentials as New Zealand's ambassador to Israel. New Zealand Prime Minister Helen Clarke suspended relations with Israel in mid-2004 following the conviction and jailing of two Israelis for attempting to fraudulently obtain a New Zealand passport. Israel later apologized for the incident. Clarke accused the men of being spies for Israel's Mossad, though Israel never confirmed that.

Toronto-wed gay couple petition High Court

A gay couple filed a petition with the High Court of Justice demanding that the Interior Ministry register them as a married couple. Canadian-born Jonathan Herland, and Ayal Wallrauch were married in a civil ceremony in Toronto in 2004. The interior ministry has refused to recognize their marriage and other similar ones.

Yad Vashem helps Rwandan survivors

Yad Vashem is helping survivors of the Rwandan massacre set up their own memorial museum. Twenty members of the Tutsi tribe, which lost 800,000 members to rival Hutus in the 1994 massacre, attended a conference at Yad Vashem that features discussions about commemorating genocide and rebuilding in its aftermath. The event, held in partnership with Nyamirambo, a Tutsi NGO, and the French Memorial of the Shoah, included tours of Yad Vashem and meetings between Rwandans and Holocaust survivors.

Fini urges world to back Israel, condemns Iran

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ROME — Italy's foreign minister said the international community must help guarantee Israel's security and condemned Iran's president for saying the Jewish state should be "wiped off the map," according to a newspaper interview published Saturday.

Gianfranco Fini was also quoted as saying that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad merely said what many others think "but have not always dared speak with such brutality."

"Not recognizing Israel's right to exist is an incentive for terrorism because the moment you don't recognize a state's right to exist you don't recognize a people's right to exist," Fini was quoted as saying by Milan daily Corriere della Sera.

"Ahmadinejad's words help those who are working to make sure the Middle East never stabilizes, and fuels… the fire that fuels terrorism."

Fini also urged Iran to be transparent about its nuclear aspirations, saying it was not in the interest of the international community to isolate Iran.

"No one is thinking about an armed conflict with Iran," the newspaper quoted him as saying.

Fini opted not to participate in a rally in Rome last Thursday, in which Italians from all political factions marched with Israeli flags and torches toward the Iranian embassy in Rome to protest Ahmadinejad's statement.

Fini said he would not participate the rally, despite a promise to Israel that he would do so, in order to avoid damaging Italian national interests.

The United Nations's nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, is scheduled to hold a meeting later this month to decide whether to refer Iran to the UN Security Council. Iran says its nuclear program is exclusively for generating electricity.

Last Friday, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan cancelled his forthcoming trip to Tehran because of the Iranian president's statements, the UN said.

Annan had planned to visit the Iranian capital, presumably to talk about Iran's nuclear policy, during a swing through the Middle East beginning next week. But after the trip was arranged, Ahmadinejad made the comment, drawing international condemnation.

"The secretary-general and the Iranian government have mutually agreed that this is not an appropriate time for him to travel to Iran," UN spokesperson Stephane Dujarric said.

"In light of the ongoing controversy, it would have been difficult to advance the agenda that he had wanted to discuss with the Iranian leadership," Dujarric said.

Annan had rebuked the Iranian president earlier for his comments, as did the European Union, the United States, Russia, Canada and many other nations.

The Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem said Annan made the right move.

"This is not a time for business as usual with the regime in Tehran," said spokesperson Mark Regev. He added that Israel "welcomes the international outrage" over Ahmadinejad's remarks.

Israel accuses Iran of backing armed Palestinian groups as well as the Lebanese guerrilla group Hezbollah.

Since the 1967 and 1973 Middle East wars, Israel has come under attack at the UN from a coalition of countries in the Middle East, Africa and Asia.

In 1975, the General Assembly voted to equate Zionism with racism, a resolution that was repealed in the 1990s. But Annan has said "deep and painful scars remain" for both sides. During his tenure, he has made it a priority to reach out to Jews.

Ahmadinejad made his threat to "wipe Israel off the map" Oct. 26 to a conservative student conference in Tehran, where he also said that Islamic nations "will not let its historic enemy live in its heartland."

After international protests, Ahmadinejad reconfirmed his remarks, and his foreign ministry announced it was recalling more than 40 ambassadors and senior diplomats, who are perceived as moderates favouring better ties with the West.

A wave of demonstrations in support of Israel swept across Europe last Wednesday evening, with protesters gathering in front of Iranian embassies in a number of capitals, including Paris and Rome.

More than 2,000 people demonstrated outside the Iranian embassy in Paris to protest Ahmadinejad's remarks. They carried signs reading "Israel will conquer:" and "Iran is a murderer." The rally, organized by French Jewish groups, was attended by representatives of the government and various political parties.

JOSEPH ✡ WOLF LEBOVIC JEWISH COMMUNITY CAMPUS

FOOD SERVICES, CONFERENCE FACILITIES AND MULTI-PURPOSE THEATRE LEASE AND/OR MANAGEMENT OPPORTUNITY

REQUEST FOR EXPRESSIONS OF INTEREST AND STATEMENT OF QUALIFICATIONS

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is seeking expressions of interest to operate its food services, conference centre and multi-purpose theatre facilities on the new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, located in the City of Vaughan on Bathurst Street (between Rutherford Road & Major Mackenzie Drive) scheduled to open in Fall 2008.

Up to 6,000 visitors are expected daily to the 300,000 sq. ft. facility which includes:
- The Schwartz/Reisman Centre's state-of-the-art fitness facility, child care centre, cultural, education and arts programs
- Community Social Service Agencies
- A Family Health & Wellness Centre
- The Kimel Family Education Centre serving 850 high school students (opening in Fall 2007)

The successful proponents will demonstrate superior management skills in overseeing the operation of a 40,000 sq. ft. conference centre, café, multi-purpose theatre, and provide quality food services to all campus user groups. Future campus plans call for several elementary schools and other community facilities. Kashruth will be strictly observed.

Interested parties should submit a statement of qualifications, including corporate background, financial capability, a list of all principals and/or senior officers and relevant experience in the operation and management of similar facilities. Consideration will be given to those who demonstrate the ability to provide comprehensive services to the campus, to proponents with interest in an individual component of the package and to joint ventures. The successful proponent(s) will be expected to invest in kitchen equipment, furniture, fixtures and operating equipment. Based upon the submissions received from this call for Expressions of Interest, a formal Request for Proposals will be issued to a short list who best demonstrate an ability to meet the criteria for successful operation of the facilities.

All expressions of interest should be submitted in triplicate to the address below by 3:00 pm Friday, November 25, 2005.

THE CHANGING FACE OF CANADIAN JEWISH ADVOCACY

On February 10, 2004 the historical Protocol Agreement was signed by the representatives of Canada's leading Jewish organizations. This Agreement established the principle of mutual respect for differing strategies and views by either the constituent advocacy bodies funded by the UIA Federations Canada or those of the independent grassroots B'nai Brith organization. Jewish advocacy, it was now held, would be conducted by the two mainstream organizational bodies, providing Canadian Jewry an important mechanism for cooperation when appropriate, and allowing for the communication of diverse viewpoints to Government, to the media, and to opinion makers generally, if necessary.

B'NAI BRITH CANADA

JEWISH ADVOCACY FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

B'nai Brith Canada shatters the silence for future generations

Silence is not the answer.

B'nai Brith was first to sound the alarm on antisemitism, warning Canadians to wake up to the real dangers of this virulent and growing hatred. The organization publishes the annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, the single most credible source on antisemitism, cited by government and law enforcement agencies the world over.
B'nai Brith is at the forefront of efforts to limit the ability of terror entities to openly function in Canada, including mounting legal challenges to the government to require the banning of known terrorist groups.

Neutrality does not yield results.

B'nai Brith urges the Government to be steadfast in its support for democratic Israel, which is routinely singled out in the United Nations by hostile and rogue nations. B'nai Brith continues to insist that Canada live up to its stated promise to oppose one-sided anti-Israel resolutions.
B'nai Brith actively reaches out to leaders of Canada's multi-faith and NGO communities, forming important strategic alliances. The organization has led diverse Missions to Israel, and seeks to promote a better understanding of the democratic values of the Jewish State of Israel.

Passivity breeds complacency.

B'nai Brith speaks out for those who are being denied a voice. B'nai Brith has a proud history of speaking out strongly against slaughters in such places as the Sudan and Rwanda, assisting Vietnamese Boat People, and intervening in the Supreme Court on behalf of targeted minority groups.
B'nai Brith initiated the Holocaust and Hope Educators' Tour to Israel to sensitize teachers through on-site visits, and personal contacts, and to use this experience as a springboard for developing Holocaust education curricula in Canada.

Responsible activism, a catalyst for change.

B'nai Brith champions the rights of Jewish students. B'nai Brith has consistently come to the defence of Jewish youth who have been subjected to intimidation and anti-Jewish hostility, both on and off campuses.
B'nai Brith counters the spread of hate, both at home and abroad, using the full range of its diverse resources – including legal challenges, the daily monitoring of foreign language newspapers and internet sites, and cooperating with international organizations that share our concern for human rights.

B'nai Brith Canada, the Jewish voice that will always deliver a strong and principled message.

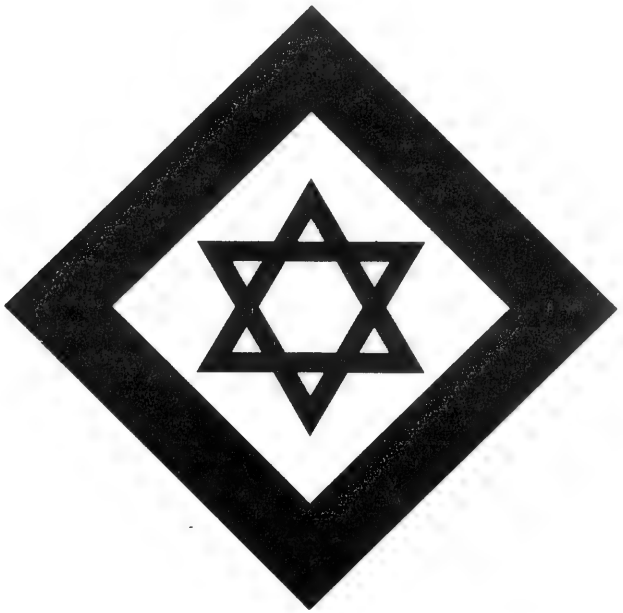
Will we finally be accepted?



Will the International Red Cross finally accept Magen David Adom?

Switzerland will convene an international conference on December 5-6 to consider adopting a third, non-denominational emblem for the International Red Cross, which is based in Geneva. Currently, the International Red Cross only recognizes the cross and crescent and not the red Star of David used by Israel's emergency medical service, Magen David Adom. This ruling has been used to keep Magen David Adom from being a member of the international body.

Daniel R. Allen, Executive Vice President of American Friends of Magen David Adom, said, "We are appreciative of the great efforts by the Bush and Clinton administrations and the American Red Cross that will result in a December diplomatic conference in Geneva for the sole purpose of agreeing that Israel's Magen David Adom Society can join the International Red Cross as a full member. Magen David Adom has served the causes of humanity ably without regard to religion, race, or politics for 75 years in Israel and around the world. We hope that MDA's proposed, long overdue admission into the International Red Cross is a hopeful sign for peace for all peoples."

Journalist investigates dark chapter in Jewish history

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"It was a huge challenge for a journalist to piece together this story," said Isabel Vincent, discussing her latest book, Bodies and Souls, which is bound to shock many readers.

Published in Canada on Nov. 5 by Random House, Bodies and Souls – the first popular work on the subject in English – explores a dark, hushed-up chapter of modern Jewish history.

During an 80-year period from the 1860s onward, a Jewish criminal gang, Zwi Migdal, lured thousands of young, impoverished, naive Jewish women from eastern Europe into prostitution.

Thinking they were going abroad to be domestics or factory workers, or simply duped into marriages of convenience, they found themselves confined in brothels in Latin America, the United States, South Africa, China and India.

Vincent, a Toronto-based writer of Portuguese ancestry who wrote for the National Post until recently, builds her narrative around three such women who ended up in Brazil and Argentina.

Considered unclean by the Jewish communities, they were shunned, as were their pimps. Ostracized, they formed synagogues and institutions. In Rio de Janeiro, they established their own cemetery.

Although decades have elapsed since Zwi Migdal's heyday, the topic is so sensitive that it is still very much off-bounds in Jewish circles in Rio and Buenos Aires. "In some quarters, there is still a stigma, a code of silence, about it," said Vincent.

Isabel Vincent

She spent five long years researching the subject because of the difficulty of convincing people to speak openly about the polacas, the Jewish prostitutes from the shtetls and cities of eastern Europe.

Indeed, only about 10 per cent of the individuals she approached were willing to talk, and not one of their thousands of descendants agreed to be interviewed.

Despite the constant rebuffs, she did not despair. "I knew the information was there," said Vincent, whose last book was Hitler's Silent Partners: Swiss Banks, Nazi Gold and the Pursuit of Justice.

She immersed herself in the literature, reading what she could find in libraries, from Edward Bristow's Prostitution and Prejudice: The Jewish Fight Against White Slavery, 1879-1939 to Nora Glickman's The Jewish White Slave Trade and the Untold Story of Raquel Liberman.

Vincent also pored over Beatriz Kushnir's Portuguese language account of the Jewish slave trade, based on her MA thesis. "She was very helpful," Vincent said of Kushnir. "She handed over her archives to me."

In addition, Vincent scoured national, municipal and state archives in Brazil and talked to 28 women and men in Rio and Toronto whose first-hand or anecdotal knowledge of shtetl life and the workings of Zwi Migdal was of immense value.

To her regret, she did not have access to the most complete set of archives relating to Zwi Migdal. It was destroyed in 1994 when Iranian-abetted Muslim terrorists attacked a Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires.

Vincent, however, was able to visit the prostitutes' cemetery in Inhauma, a Rio suburb, where 797 gravestones moulder away. The caretaker told her that the last burial was in the 1970s.

She was unable to read the cemetery's registry book, which disappeared several years ago. She believes that well-meaning "historians" who sought to erase a black mark on the past destroyed or hid it.

Vincent, 40, knew next to nothing about these women when she started her research. "I had heard references about the polacas in Brazil, but didn't know what they meant."

Once she was hooked, there was no turning back. "I thought there was a great human story to tell, and I felt sorry for these people. Although they were marginalized, they clung to their faith. That, to me, was so moving."

Vincent, whose parents immigrated to Canada in 1953, wrote two drafts of Bodies and Souls, the rights of which have been sold in Israel, Spain, Italy and Poland so far.

Her first draft was far too scholarly. "It read like a university text. Nearly all the sentences were footnoted," she said.

At her editor's suggestion, she revised the manuscript, making it fully accessible.

In her estimation, 10,000 to 15,000 Jewish women were caught in Zwi Migdal's net. Only a handful are still alive.

As far as she knows, Zwi Migdal was never active in Canada.

According to Vincent, the illicit trade has inspired novels – O Ciclo das Aguas by the Brazilian Jewish writer Moacyr Scliar comes to mind – and at least one samba.

Asked whether Jews are involved in South American prostitution today, she said, "I didn't look into that issue."

Two-sided argument on Middle East issue

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

"Know thine enemy" is easy to say but harder to do. A remounted piece of theatre, though, hopes to make that necessary task much easier for Toronto audiences.

Updated from its Summerworks Festival run, Territories begins with a Jewish woman recounting the difficulty of dealing with a friend killed by a suicide bomber in Israel. But the play soon turns to a two-hander when a Palestinian man "disrupts" the show to insist his side be heard.

The play is far from fiction, says the show's author Niki Landau, a Toronto playwright and graduate of York University's theatre program. Fifteen years ago, a suicide bomber killed Landau's friend in Israel, a traumatic incident that compelled Landau to write Territories (albeit in a shortened form) at school.

"But I didn't want a regular solo show," she tells me between rehearsals. "I wanted to make it something different." By including the Palestinian Hisham (played by Sam Khalilieh), Landau essentially created a two-sided argument on the Middle East issue.

"There's a lot of debate about whose show it is," Landau says. Between heated exchanges, Hisham brings the woman Sara to his past as flashbacks recreate fond — and not so fond — memories.

The play aims to highlight how difficult it is to listen to your enemy's story, Landau explains. "In seeing the other side as human, it's a very painful process," she adds.

It's a process she had to deal with personally. Having faced deep sadness after her friend's death, Landau visited Israel several years ago with the Compassionate Listening Project, a non-profit organization dedicated to "Jewish-Palestinian reconciliation." By touring the territories to learn how all cultures were affected by the violence, Landau gradually understood the importance of education over ignorance.

If this sounds like serious political theatre, expect to be surprised. Landau mentions how integral it was to include comedy so Hisham and Sara could poke fun at each other. "Audiences want to see something relevant but they also want to be entertained," she says.

Theatre goers might have already been entertained by Territories when it first ran in shortened form at the Summerworks Theatre Festival last August, but Landau promises the show will change from its summer version. The play is 25 minutes longer and is also benefited by "better technical support," she says tactfully.

What remains the same is the director, Landau's husband Paul Lampert. A theatre professor at York University who has directed extensively at the Shaw Festival, he views Territories as a mini-course in Mideast education. The play made him realize how "so many Israelis and Palestinians work for peace," he says. He pauses. "This wants to make me to go to Israel."

He also agrees with his wife's assertion that political theatre requires an injection of entertainment. "Purely dogmatic theatre is not going to penetrate with audiences," he says. "[Territories] is moving and funny, self-deprecating in places, and makes fun of theatre as an art form."

As a husband-and-wife team, does the personal ever bleed into the professional?

Sometimes, Lampert answers. "Our relationship is blessed with free and open communication about what works and what doesn't, but that can also get us both in trouble. And our work comes back with us at home, which means it can get very intense but we also get way more work done."

Already a critical success, Territories may find another stage outside Canada. Plans are in the works to take the production to Israel.

Two films show the faces of suicide bombers and their victims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It was inevitable that filmmakers would "discover" the Palestinian suicide bomber, who has ruthlessly cut a swath of death and destruction in Israel for the past 11 years. Two new movies, both screened at this year's Toronto International Film Festival, address that relevant but gory topic.

Paradise Now, a riveting full-length feature film directed by Hany Abu-Assad, is scheduled to open in local theatres on Nov.11. It charts the last 48 hours of two such bombers ordered to explode themselves in Tel Aviv.

Diameter of the Bomb, a National Film Board of Canada documentary directed by Steven Silver and Andrew Quigley, is due to start its commercial run next year. With clinical precision, it examines the numbing aftermath of a bus bombing in Jerusalem in which 22 passengers were killed and 50 wounded.

Paradise Now is set in Nablus – a town occupied by the Israeli army – and is centred around two childhood friends, Said and Khaled, recruited to carry out the attack. Both are auto mechanics and are pleased to have been selected for the mission. "The occupation defines the resistance," says Said (Kais Nashef), justifying the gruesome act on which he is about to embark.

Suha (Lubna Azabal), an attractive young woman who flirts with Said after bringing her car into the garage for service, opposes violence. She claims that Israel would not brutalize Palestinians if suicide attacks ceased. By inserting a moderate Palestinian in his script, Abu-Assad avoids the accusation that Paradise Now is a tissue of propaganda.

Her words, of course, have no effect on either Said or Khaled (Ali Suliman). Their bearded recruiter, Jamal (Amer Hlehel), bolsters their resolve by arguing that "death is better than inferiority."

Although the tone of the film is deadly serious, there are lighter moments as well. Khaled, a submachine-gun in hand, strikes a scowling pose for a video to be released after his death. Having finished it, he is duly informed that the camera was not working. Deflated by the technical glitch, Khaled composes himself and resumes his belligerent pose.

Some of the most chilling footage is of Khaled and Said preparing themselves for the attack. Their heads having been shaven, they are outfitted in black business suits, thereby magically transformed into models of sober sartorial propriety.

Their commander, Abu-Karem (Ashraf Barhoum), is impressed. "You're our pride and joy," he congratulates them as he treats them to a lavish meal.

After the bombers are driven to Israel's security fence, Jamal assures Said and Khaled that two angels will transport them to paradise, where 72 virgins eagerly await them. But Said is overcome by qualms and asks, "Are we doing the right thing?" Khaled tries to hush him up. "In another hour, we'll be heroes," he boasts.

When an Israeli patrol spots them, Khaled flees. Said waits for the soldiers to pass. He then slips into Israel to detonate himself in front of a bus stop crowded with Israelis. At the last minute, he turns back, torn by pangs of conscience.

Reunited in Nablus, Said and Khaled offer their services to Jamal yet again. In the interval, Khaled is assailed by doubts, wondering whether there are not "other means of resistance."

In the final scenes, Said and Khaled buck up as they issue a litany of rationales for their joint attack. Sadly, Paradise Now leaves itself open to criticism because its message about suicide bombing is ultimately ambivalent.

Diameter of the Bomb, the title of which comes from a poem by Yehuda Amichai, focuses on the June 18, 2002 attack on the 32A city bus. Though the vast majority of the victims were Jews from the new Jerusalem suburb of Gilo, an Israeli Arab and an Ethiopian Christian girl were also among the casualties.

This graphic film, based on emotionally wrenching interviews and stark news footage, is a kind of post-mortem of the impact of the bombing.

The relatives of the dead, a bereaved husband and still shocked parents, recall their loved ones. A bus driver talks about his unscientific method of ferreting out suspicious looking passengers. A forensic expert explains how badly injured corpses are identified through dental records, fingerprints, DNA and blood samples. A fireman recalls the horrific sights and odours at the scene of the blast.

Barely suppressing tears, a hardened surgeon who tried to save the life of one of the victims, a vivacious young woman not even in the prime of her life, recalls the various hues on her face as she was wheeled into the hospital. She was an "unsalvageable case," he intones, referring to her destroyed lungs and liver.

The bomber's driver has no regrets whatsoever, saying that death is beautiful when the cause is right.

> Paradise Now, Diameter of the Bomb, contain chilling footage

In home-made videos, the Israeli Arab victim, Mohammed, and the Hamas bomber are brought back to life, if only for a few flickering seconds.

Mohammed aspired to be a lawyer. The bomber describes his attack as an "honourable act." His parents express pride in his martyrdom.

Black plastic body bags containing body remains line a sidewalk. The detached head of the bomber lies starkly on the road.

The face of Barak, the devastated husband who lost his wife, Michal, is a study in pain and anguish. "She was a very happy person," he says. "I loved her." Michal's wedding video adds another layer of sadness to the gloom.

The camera pans on a closet full of clothes that belonged to Shari, the outgoing young woman who was also on the ill-fated bus. In a piercing lament, Shari's mother says, "I didn't say good-bye to her."

Parchment pays tribute to its former editor

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The late Toronto poet Malca Litovitz is the focus of a special tribute in the latest issue of the literary journal Parchment, which is being launched in Toronto this Sunday just a week after what would have been the Hamilton-born poet's 53rd birthday.

Litovitz was a former poetry editor of Parchment, the latest issue of which contains three poems by her and seven others in tribute to her. Her first poetry collection, To Light, To Water, won a Canadian Jewish Book Award in 2000.

A second collection, At the Moonbean Cafe, was published in 2003 and a third is scheduled for publication next year. Her poetry books were published by Guernica Editions of Toronto. Her poems were also printed in many journals and anthologies.

Malca (née Halpern) Litovitz died in July, leaving behind husband Allan and son Adam. Samples of her poetry may be found at the website www.library.utoronto.ca/canpoetry/litovitz/index.htm.

The former professor of English and creative writing at Seneca College is one of two people to whom the 14th edition of the annual journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish writing is dedicated: the other is Milton Harris, philanthropist and former Congress head.

"Malca had a gentle and spiritual quality to her voice," said her friend, poet Merle Nudelman. "She was a gute neshama, a kind soul, always with a smile."

Malca Litovitz

Poet Elana Wolff grew close to Malca as they collaborated on a series of renga poems in which they wrote alternating lines; the 36 poems they completed are due for publication next year.

"She was a person of grace and graciousness, delicacy and sensitivity," Wolff said. "She had really a very fine, fine spirit. I never heard her say a nasty word about anyone or anything, and when you were in her presence you felt uplifted. She had a wonderful rapport with her students and she was a tremendous mentor."

To poet Ron Charach, she was also a great listener. "You always got the feeling when you were reading that Malca was listening to your work. She was wonderfully receptive to other people's work."

The Parchment launch is hosted by editor Adam Fuerstenberg and features readings from various contributors including Nudelman, Wolff, Ken Sherman and Anne Dublin. One Shot profiles Israeli army snipers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nurit Kedar's taut documentary, One Shot, peers into the murky world of Israeli army snipers, who, with the squeeze of a trigger, existentially decide who will live and who will die.

This unusual movie will be screened at the Rendezvous with Madness film festival on Nov. 11 at 1:30 p.m.

Several former snipers, all young men in their prime, talk about their expertise in interviews. Their comments are juxtaposed against the backdrop of flickering and eerie homemade video clips filmed in actual combat.

In Israel, snipers are deployed to kill Palestinians who have been identified as terrorists. Crouching on the ground, waiting patiently for their prey to appear in the cross-hairs of their rifle scopes, they are a breed apart.

Cool and collected, with nerves of steel, snipers are the masters of the ambush. Their victims, alive one second and dead the next, crumple like rag dolls.

One Shot, the first Israeli film of its kind, opens with a dramatic flourish as snipers lie in wait at daybreak for several men to leave a building somewhere in the West Bank.

Two Palestinians, sleep still in their eyes and coffee mugs in hand, are hit by a silent volley of bullets. A third Palestinian appears on the scene, shocked by the sight of their lifeless bodies. He, too, is cut down. The sniper says he did not want to kill the third man. He had hoped he would leave before it was too late.

The snipers are supremely detached. They have no "burning desire" to be professional assassins, as one sniper puts it. It's a routine, a game. There is no room for empathy or compassion.

A sniper, having been congratulated for hitting a terrorist cleanly between the eyes, says, "I'm sure I did something right." Another sniper says, "I don't feel like a murderer."

One Shot is particularly poignant as three snipers struggle with their respective consciences.

"I'm not going to heaven," the first sniper muses. The second one recalls a gory incident in which he had to shoot someone from a distance of only two metres. The third sniper poses a rhetorical question about his skills: "Is is cold-blooded murder?" He pauses, then asks, "What is cold-blooded murder?"

Who knows? One Shot wisely avoids moralizing.

Thought-provoking film profiles female sofer

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The ancient Jewish sages say that everybody is commanded to write a Torah. But does everybody mean men and women?

Traditionally, only men have written Torah scrolls, but one Canadian Orthodox woman is seeking to change that.

Soferet: A Special Scribe, airing on Vision TV Nov. 16 at 10 p.m. and again Nov. 17 at 11 p.m., tells the story of Vancouver's Aviel Barclay, said to be the world's first female Jewish ritual scribe, who is helping to transcribe a Torah for a small congregation in Seattle, Wash.

Barclay's desire to write the sacred text stems not from a rebellious, feminist nature, but rather from her soul.

She's doing it for spiritual reasons and believes she's been called to the task by God.

In fact, she wishes the precedent had been set before her and has no desire to be in the vanguard of this particular revolution.

Barclay was born Alison Barclay in Prince George, B.C., and was raised as a Christian. She first saw the Hebrew alphabet in Fiddler On The Roof when she was a young girl.

"It looked like fire to me," she relates. "I was drawn to it."

Amazingly, she taught herself the Hebrew alphabet at age 10, around the same time she became interested in calligraphy.

As an adult, she found herself drawn to Judaism and chose to convert and enter the Orthodox community. She rediscovered her interest in calligraphy and desired to become a soferet.

But there were many obstacles in her path. Needing a mentor, she advertised for one, but no one was willing to take her on, until one day a scribe in Jerusalem contacted her to help her with her calligraphy.

Meanwhile, a sympathetic rabbi combed available halachic sources for a ruling that would allow a female Torah scribe.

Her quest is highly controversial. Many Jewish authorities believe rabbinic law forbids a woman from writing a Torah scroll for ritual use. But others interpret the law differently. At the same time, Barclay has no intention of causing a furor and wishes to respect the community she's chosen to live in.

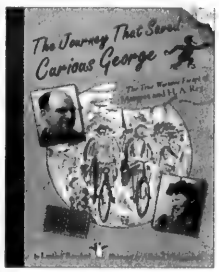
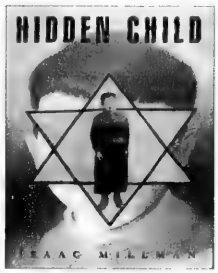
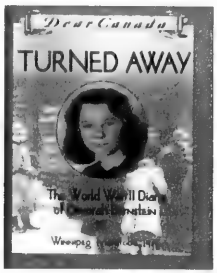
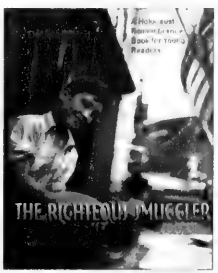
Books introduce kids to difficult Holocaust subject

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter









Books about the Holocaust written for children have to straddle a thin line. On the one hand, such books have the obligation to give a faithful account of the horrors of Europe during World War II; that is the duty of all of us, especially since the survivor generation is aging and disappearing.

On the other hand, the books must be interesting enough, entertaining enough, if you will, to keep a child reading without resulting in nightmares and phobias.

For most of us, the introduction to such literature is the Diary of Anne Frank. Admittedly, this is not a work of fiction. However, the simply written, introspective book, immeasurably moving, full of the innocence and yearnings of a teenager forced to live in hiding, has fired the imagination and questioning spirit of generations.

Lois Lowry's Number the Stars and Carol Matas' award-winning books Lisa's Story, and Jesper all tell of young Danish people who, together with the local resistance, helped their Jewish neighbours escape the country. Matas' Daniel's Story, a moving story about a young boy on the run, is being used at the Washington Holocaust Museum.

Canadians Karen Levine and Kathy Kacer have highlighted individual stories; Levine's Hana's Suitcase follows a young girl's imprisonment in Terezin, to her death in a concentration camp, and her suitcase winding up in a school in Japan, where it helped teach children in that far off country about those awful days.

In Kacer's Secret of Gabi's Dresser a family heirloom becomes a hiding place during a Nazi raid.

A relatively new book, Paper Clips, by Peter and Dagmar Schroeder, is a wonderful story of a school in middle America that decides to commemorate the Holocaust by collecting six million paper clips – one for each Jewish victim. They wind up with enough for many other victims of Nazi terror, and establish a museum, complete with cattle car that had been used to transport people to the concentration camps. It is now a movie, that has just begun to play in theatres.

There are several books that have appeared very recently, perhaps spurred on by the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the camps by Allied soldiers.

The Doll with the Yellow Star by Yona Zeldis McDonough [Henry Holt, 2005] is a lovely story about a young girl, Claudine, who lives in France with her parents. One birthday, her parents give her a doll, which she names Violette. Life seems wonderful, until the Nazis invade.

Suddenly, her non-Jewish friends don't speak to her, she can't go to school and food becomes scarce. Then, the most humiliating for her, she and all the Jews are forced to wear a yellow star. In fury, she sews a tiny yellow star on the inside of her doll's coat.

Her parents manage to send her to America, to live with her aunt, uncle and cousins. They are kind to her, but she misses her parents and friends terribly, and especially Violette, whom she accidentally left on board the ship.

Her mother never returns, but her father does, and the two slowly rebuild their lives in Brooklyn. Then, one day, they buy a chest at an auction sale. Inside the chest they find a dirty, broken doll, with a wrinkled coat – with a yellow star inside the lining.

Some children managed to survive the war as what are now called "hidden children." They were taken in by convents, orphanages, or by private families, motivated by courage, kindness, or, in many cases, by greed.

Isaac Millman was such a child, and tells his story in Hidden Child [Frances Foster, 2005]. What makes this book different, is that Millman has drawn cartoons and sketches which describe the people he meets, the places he is shuttled around to, and some of his experiences.

Another book about the resistance to Nazi violence is The Righteous Smuggler by Debbie Spring [Second Story Press, 2005]. Hendrik, a 12 year old Dutch boy, helps his father smuggle Jews out of the country so that they can go to safety in England. Many of those they help are friends and business acquaintances of the family.

At first, Hendrik resents the time and effort spent in these rescue missions, especially when he has to miss a long-awaited birthday party. Gradually, though, he comes to realize the importance of what they are doing.

Another aspect of the war, and not a particularly happy one, is dealt with in Turned Away: The World War II Diary of Devorah Bernstein, another of Carol Matas' war stories [Scholastic Canada, 2005].

Devorah is a young Jewish girl growing up in Winnipeg during the war. Her two brothers and her cousin have enlisted, like so many of her acquaintances, and one brother and her cousin are taken prisoner in Hong Kong. Her main worry is her family in Paris, who are having a very difficult time. Devorah's parents, and the whole Jewish community are trying desperately to bring Jews from Europe to Canada, but run into opposition from the government, especially from Frederick Clarence Blair, the anti-Semitic civil servant who coined the infamous "None is Too Many" philosophy.

She manages to correspond for several years with her cousin Sarah in France, and these letters alternately cheer, depress and terrify her. In the end, they are unable to help their Jewish relatives. In her diary, she constantly worries about whether she ought to be able to enjoy her life in Canada when so many are suffering.

Few children (and their parents) have missed the delightful Curious George books, a series of books about a monkey who keeps getting into trouble. What isn't so well known is the story of George's creator, H.A. Rey and his wife Margret. Louise Borden has produced The Journey that Saved Curious George; the true Wartime Escape of Margret and H.A. Rey [Houghton Mifflin, 2005]. The Reys, both Jewish, managed to escape what had been an idyllic life in Montmartre, in Paris, as they had, in their wanderings, been fortunate enough to obtain Brazilian citizenship. During their escape from France, skillfully illustrated with sketches by Allan Drummond and photographs, they luckily brought some of their manuscripts and contracts with them – including what would eventually become Curious George.

Sheba Medical Centre a leader in field of rehab

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Chaim Sheba Medical Center is one of Israel's best kept secrets, says Dr. Shlomo Noy, director of its Rehabilitation Hospital.

The centre in Tel Hashomer near Tel Aviv has five departments: orthopedics, neurological rehabilitation, respiratory rehabilitation, multiple sclerosis and a day hospital. It also boasts an acute care hospital, a long-term care facility, a research centre, and is home to the Israel National Center for Health Policy and Epidemiology Research, the Israel National Center for Medical Simulation and the national blood bank.

Yet people just don't know about it, Noy said with regret.

The Israel-born son of Holocaust survivors and former naval medical officer was in Toronto to encourage the development of Canadian Friends of Sheba Hospital and to raise funds for a new, state-of-the-art, virtual reality rehabilitation program.

The hospital, he said, "grew with the state." In June 1948, a month after the establishment of the State of Israel, David Ben-Gurion, the country's first prime minister, together with physician Chaim Sheba, a hospital administrator, army surgeon general and later director general of the Ministry of Health, visited Tel Hashomer, the site of a very large British army camp. Ben-Gurion, Noy said, realized that there was a great need for rehabilitation services, especially for soldiers of the War of Independence.

Rehabilitation became the focus of Sheba Medical Centre, and it is now a world leader in the field, Noy said. Victims of all Israel's wars and the many terror attacks are referred there from all over the country.

Patients benefit from the continuum of care offered there, said Noy. For instance, eight hours after a person has a limb removed, he begins rehabilitation, which will eventually include fitting and training in the use of prosthetics.

SEED money from the Christopher Reeve Foundation has enabled the facility to do clinical trials on drug therapy to aid quadraplegic and paraplegic patients. As well, he said, those with high cervical spine injuries, who cannot breathe without the aid of a ventilator (like Reeve himself) can be put on a stretcher to receive hydrotherapy, portable ventilation, or any other kind of treatment or therapy.

Sheba has one of the most developed programs to treat multiple sclerosis in the world, Noy said. The 1,600 active patients receive comprehensive services, including new drug therapies and social work.

Since 1997, the day hospital has treated paraplegics on an ambulatory basis, which, Noy said, helps return them to a more natural environment than a hospital offers.

The real challenge of the future, however, Noy said, is integrating new technologies into rehabilitation programs. Already, he said, Sheba's knowledge and expertise has been sent to other countries, including Mexico, which has been given eight rehabilitation facilities, but no experienced or trained personnel.

In Israel, Sheba is using virtual reality technology. For instance, he said, there is a "floating floor," a floor that looks and feels as if it is moving. Through sensors attached to the body, a person can reorient themselves so that they can stand and walk. This is not only helpful to those with prosthetics, but for people with movement disorders such as Parkinson's disease.

Lokomat, a robotic device that enables paraplegics to walk, not only reduces the danger of pneumonia, but helps strengthen muscles of the upper body. "Walter Reed Hospital in Bethesda, Md., the American army medical hospital, has bought Lokomat to help those injured in Iraq," Noy said.

Sheba Medical Centre serves as an education centre too, especially in handling mass catastrophes, such as chemical warfare. "The U.S. Army and the Canadian government has used its simulated programs," Noy said.

Sheba's programs are not only for victims of war and terror, Noy said. Many are from the plethora of car accidents which are so common in Israel.

One of the main elements at Sheba is research, Noy said, including cancer, neuroscience, and stem cells. "Eleven groups are doing cutting edge research into stem cells," he said.

L'chaim Retirement Home

Judy Cohen, Founder

Dear Judy:
I want to thank you, Esther, and your outstanding staff for how beautifully you helped my mother make the transition to retirement life. She is so happy with her new friends and the loving attention she gets from the staff. I am so impressed: the staff doesn't just "work" there, they really care about the residents and their families, and treat everyone with such dignity and warmth. L'chaim doesn't feel at all like an institution, it feels like a family. It was an excellent choice!
Best wishes, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Maccabi Tel Aviv opens quest for historic threepeat

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — No team has ever won European basketball's showcase competition three seasons in a row. Trying to make history after back-to-back wins in 2004 and 2005, Maccabi Tel Aviv opened its defence of its European crown at Yad Eliahu against Prokom Sopot of Poland last week.

Maccabi Tel Aviv won easily, trouncing Prokom Sopot 95-68.

As Maccabi tries to make history, centre Nikola Vujcic made some history of his own last week by recording the first triple-double in Euroleague history – 11 points, 12 rebounds and 11 assists.

Vujcic was ably supported by his teammates, with Maccabi newcomer Kirk Penney's 19 points, Jamie Arnold's 17 points, Anthony Parker's 12 points, Derrick Sharp's 11 points, and Maceo Baston's 10 points.

Will Solomon, brought in to replace Sarunas Jasikevicius (Saras), had a disappointing night, scoring just seven points.

For Prokom, Istvan Nemeth scored 17 points, Adam Wojcik had 14, and Goran Jagodnik finished with 12.

The game started evenly, with the home side taking a 23-21 lead at the end of the first quarter. In the second quarter, however, Maccabi stepped up play and ended the half with an 11-point lead, 46-35.

The Polish side cut the deficit to eight early in the third quarter, but Maccabi pulled away again, this time led by Vujcic. The centre, who shone in a pre-season game in Toronto against the Raptors last month, first fed Baston for a two-handed dunk to start a 12-0 run, then converted a pair of three-point plays to help Maccabi jump ahead 58-40.

Prokom fought back. A Tomas Masiulis three-pointer trimmed Maccabi's lead to single digits but Arnold and Penny helped the hosts pull ahead again to 72-56.

A behind-the-back Vujcic pass to Arnold for a basket gave the Maccabi centre his 10th assist of the game as he recorded the triple-double.

Sharon Shason replaced Vujcic, who left to a loud standing ovation, and Arnold beat the 24-second clock with a three-pointer in the closing seconds to seal the win.

Several Maccabi players – including Sasson, New Zealander Penney and Arnold – were making their Euroleague debuts. Maccabi newcomer Solomon is a Euroleague veteran, with previous stints with Turkey's Efes Pilsen and Hapoel Jerusalem.

Observers believe Maccabi's key test this season will be how it manages without Saras. On the positive side, the backbone of last year's team – Baston, Parker, Vujcic and Tal Burstein – remains unchanged.

Maccabi was on fire in the pre-season, notching wins over all its opponents, including the Raptors, until it lost to the NBA's Orlando Magic and then followed that game with an embarrassing defeat against Belgium's Charleroi.

The good news at Maccabi's final training session was Solomon's return to health.

"I'm very excited," Solomon said after having missed two days of practice due to an illness. "I know this arena [Yad Eliahu] well. I played here against Maccabi two years ago, and it will be great to play with 10,000 fans for me this time. I already feel a part of Maccabi. I felt at home from day one."

Coach Pini Gershon was his usual relaxed self. Asked before the game whether he was excited about beginning the defence of the team's European crown, he replied with a smile: "Let's not get carried away. This is one of those games that depends more on us than on the opposition. One of the problems with the first game of the season is that we may not be firing on all cylinders. We have four or five players who have not played at Yad Eliahu yet, and I hope we won't need diapers for them."

"It's very tough to start season with an away game against Maccabi," he said. "Everybody realizes how strong this team is, how tough a task is before us. We'll try to play the best game we can there.

"We planned some ideas, but it's always much easier to say than to do. Maccabi is a champion with a lot of great names. I think that their starting lineup is particularly very strong. Of course, the back-up players are also very good, but the first five are just great. Maccabi and Barcelona are favourites [in] our group."

A good judge is hard to find

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

The role of the judiciary in North America has been at the forefront of the news recently. In Canada, Justice John Gomery has just released an interim report apportioning blame in the sponsorship scandal. In the United States, President George W. Bush is having difficulty getting his nominees for the Supreme Court ratified. (How much of the negativity being voiced is based on true moral outrage and how much on political expediency, only God – and perhaps the complainers themselves –truly knows.)

The difficulty of finding qualified judges is a problem dating back to biblical times. Moshe Rabbeinu himself initially decided all cases by himself. His father-in-law criticized him, pointing out that even the greatest of all men needs to appoint a qualified team to assist him. "What you are doing is not good," Yitro scolded. "Seek out from amongst the people, capable, God-fearing – men of truth, hating unjust gain." Unfortunately this task proved impossible, and Moshe could only find "capable men."

Despite the inherent difficulties in finding truly God-fearing men who hate unjust gain, Jewish law nonetheless demands that our standards be kept as high as possible. The Rambam codifies a series of requirements for those appointed to the Sanhedrin – whose members could judge capital cases. They must be exceptional in their knowledge of Torah and equipped with great analytical prowess. They must be familiar with other areas of human knowledge, such as "medicine, mathematics, astronomy, all forms of witchcraft and sorcery [a common issue in ancient times] and idolatrous practices." Judges must also understand the cultural and intellectual milieu in which they function – those firmly ensconced in an ivory tower need not apply.

Even more important than intellectual achievement is moral character. Thus the Rambam rules that even in civil courts of three – the courts that actually function today – the judges must be "humble, hate money [i.e. earned inappropriately], love truth, love people, and own a good reputation." The Rambam also rules that those who do not have children may not be a member of a sanhedrin. While such a rule may be deemed unconstitutional in the western world, it reflects Judaism's honest appraisal of the human condition, as a childless person is apt to lack the requisite compassion that a judge must possess. (Similarly, insurance premiums are lower for married couples with children – one drives differently with kids in the back.)

Jewish law even seems to accept the notion of mandatory retirement of judges – though at what age is unclear. It is thus quite clear that Jewish law disapproves of general elections for judges and would surely look askance at politicians making such crucial appointments. Unlike communal leaders, who must be acceptable to the masses, judges must have a degree of aloofness from political realities. Even in the rare circumstances when political appointments are made on merit alone, there is always a lingering perception that it is not so. What is needed is an arms-length body of highly respected people of upstanding integrity to make such crucial decisions.

Even the make-up of a court as a whole must be taken into account. While in North America this may translate into a woman's or ethnic seat, in Jewish courts, this translates into recognizing human frailties. Judges who do not get along personally should not sit on the bench together, as they would tend to focus their arguments on contradicting each other rather than seeking true justice.

In general, we as a society must be up to the mitzvah that commands: "Appoint yourselves judges and police in all your communities and make sure they administer honest judgement for the people."

RIGATONI WITH RED PEPPERS, WILD MUSHROOMS & FONTINA CHEESE

2 tblsp. olive oil
2 large red onions, cut crosswise into 1/2"-inch-thick slices
1 lb. assorted wild mushrooms (portobello, oyster, chanterelle, and stemmed shiitake), cut into thick slices
2 large red bell peppers, cut lengthwise into thick strips
1 lb. rigatoni
3 tsps marjoram, divided
1 1/2 cups grated Fontina cheese divided

Heat oil in large pot over high heat. Add onions; cook until soft and brown, stirring frequently, about 8 minutes. Reduce heat to medium-high. Add mushrooms; sauté until wilted, about 3 minutes. Add peppers; sauté about 5 minutes. Cook pasta in large pot of boiling salted water until tender stirring occasionally. Drain, reserving 1 cup cooking liquid. Add reserved pasta cooking liquid and 2 tsp. marjoram to skillet and stir, scraping up browned bits. Add drained pasta to sauce; toss to coat. Add 1 cup cheese; stir until melted. Transfer pasta to large bowl; sprinkle with remaining 1/2 cup cheese and 1 tsp. marjoram.

ISRAEL SEEKING BRITISH TOURISTS

Israel launched a multimillion-dollar marketing campaign to attract British tourists. Ads for Israeli vacation spots were posted on the London Underground, taxis and in the British media this week. The next stage of the campaign will be to broadcast promotional spots on British television channels Sky, ITV and Channel 4. The tourism efforts will be aided by the introduction of more direct flights from Britain to Eilat. [Israel photo]

Peace and confusion in Bereshit

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

One morning, I awoke with anxiety-plus stemming from the pressures of life and its many confrontations. Rather than letting my cyclical thoughts go on like a clothes dryer spinning wildly during the rinse cycle, I got out of bed – to do something different, something that might bring me peace of mind.

Sleepily, I tripped downstairs, put on my tallit and tfillin, walked out on my deck and opened the Chumash to the first parshah – Bereshit.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." I read this perhaps for the 45th time in my life. I read this for the very first time ever. Excitedly, I studied the inventiveness uncovered in each of the first six days of our world – the seas, insects, animals, fruit trees, man and then woman. "And he saw that his work was good." Then Shabbat was created.

The parshah talked to me. I saw it was good and it gave me peace. It did as I looked to the "great light" – the blue heavens of the morning – and glimpsed the moon, which would soon bashfully hide its face until light turns to darkness.

An aloof chilly autumn wind tapped me on my shoulder – in fact, accosted me - but my tallit, a sacred woolly shawl, was impenetrable. My usual cold skepticism of ritual dissipated momentarily and my tallit became blessed armour.

Then my world became unformed, haphazard. My old nemesis returned – a deep inner awkwardness, a blend of fear, confusion, angst and a sense of being far too small. The moon hovering above my deck began to fade and the welcoming blue hue of the 7 a.m. sky became clouded. "Cain rose up against his brother (Abel) and slew him."

In only a few short psukim (lines in the Torah), I had walked through a garden eastward, in Eden, with the man He had formed and the woman He had made, only to end up witness to a murder perpetrated by a brother against his brother. Did it have to be the very first brothers? Did murder have to come so soon "in the beginning"?

I attended a housewarming the next day, hosted by a B'nai Yisrael, an East Indian Jew – Shai Abraham. It was ritualistically complex, layered with spiritually beaded intricacy. I asked Shai's father and uncle these questions as they exuded such an eastern elegance in their interpretation of the "offerings" we blessed and ate at the ceremony. One can often sense when they are sitting amongst wise men.

Were hurt, killing, deceit and madness created with creation?

Shai's father and uncle conceded that indeed this is the case. "This," they explained, "is the reality of our world – that what lies within all of us is the option to choose the light or the darkness. The Torah tells it as it is."

So, I am Cain, and I am Abel, as you are. The Torah, in a literal sense spells it out. God created life. God created knowledge. Must be, that God too created evil.

And so my angst returned and my peace of mind left me. I have more questions now than I had before. How can pure goodness – God – create evil? How do we find our way back to the Garden? Can we ever rid ourselves of the wars, the tyrants – the Cain in us?

Sitting on my deck, as darkness turns too light, watching the birds peck at the seeds of grass still to catch, brings me great joy. I try not to allow Cain into my backyard, but he seems to know where it is. If I could only share my coffee with Abel, how full the world would be.

RABIN REMEMBERED: Some 200,000 people gathered in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square on Saturday night to mark the 10th anniversary of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. The commemoration featured an emotional address by former U.S. president Bill Clinton. Former Canadian prime minister John Turner headed Canada's delegation to an official government service held Monday. [Israel photo]

Canada urged to help resolve Palestinian refugee debate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada is uniquely positioned to change the terms of debate about Palestinian refugees and push for their resettlement, an Israeli researcher says.

As the second-largest funder of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), Canada could urge Palestinian refugees to give up on their so-called "right of return" to land in what is now Israel, said David Bedein, head of the Israel Resource News Agency and an old hand at detailing what he calls abuses at UNRWA.

"Imagine if Canada took a role in trying to convince Palestinians not to want to return," Bedein said in an interview with The CJN from New York.

He noted that at $10 million per year, Canada is second only to the United States in funding UNRWA. As well, Canada, which will also provide a further $6 million for job creation and micro-credit lending in Gaza – as announced in September – also chairs the refugee working group, the international body charged with resolving the refugee problem.

Using its leverage to urge Palestinians to pursue resettlement would do more for them than encouraging them to hold out in refugee camps for a "right" they will never exercise, Bedein suggested.

And for Canada to do so would only require that it apply the same principles of refugee resettlement that the UN High Commission on Refugees (UNHCR) operates under, he added.

Martin links Canadian, Israeli values

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In an address spiced with humour and a few hints about a pending election, Prime Minister Paul Martin praised Jewish concerns for social justice, slammed the United Nations' ritualized anti-Israel resolutions, linked Canadian and Israeli values and harshly condemned Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call for the destruction of Israel.

Prime Minister addresses GA plenary

Canada and Israel share ties of friendship, trade, culture and dialogue, Martin told nearly 4,000 delegates at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, an annual gathering that brings together representatives of 155 Jewish community organizations across North America.

"Israel's values are Canada's values… Shared values of democracy, the rule of law and the protection of human rights," Martin said Sunday night.

Canada supports Israel's rightful place in the community of nations, he said, pledging that Canada will push to end the annual anti-Israel politicized resolutions at the UN.

Martin's address was received enthusiastically, with the greatest applause coming when he censured the remarks of the Iranian leader. Canada, he said, "will speak out against the reprehensible posturing of the president of Iran."

Linking the comments to Iran's nuclear program, he branded them a "call for genocide." He said the president's comments were "a threat the world cannot ignore."

Martin opened his remarks with humour,

Manor Told To Talk

TORONTO — Boaz Manor, co-founder of failed Canadian hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management, is mentally ill and can't answer questions about investor assets, despite a court order to do so, his Israeli lawyer says. An Israeli judge last week ordered Manor, who fled to his native Israel when Portus collapsed last March, to appear Dec. 4 with a doctor before Israeli lawyers for KPMG, Portus' court-appointed receiver. KPMG wants him to account for $21 million in missing funds out of $800 million in Portus assets. Manor has said that Portus shouldn't be forced into bankruptcy, because investors can be repaid once their holdings mature, but last week an Ontario court approved a motion to start the process. Manor and Portus co-founder Michael Mendelson face Ontario Securities Commission charges of destroying documents and improperly selling products to investors. Mendelson is close to a deal with the OSC on the charges, his lawyer said last week. Manor likely won't be extradited, as he doesn't face criminal charges, the Globe and Mail reported.

Complaints Dropped

TORONTO — The Ontario College of Teachers says it won't pursue student complaints that a Windsor history teacher praised Hitler, called the Holocaust an exaggeration and insulted many ethnic groups, including Jews, because evidence about the alleged remarks is no longer available. But William Fabel, who was fired in 2002 for remarks allegedly made from 1997 to 2002 at the Catholic St. Anne High School, still faces charges he made sexual comments to female students, the Toronto Star reported. His disciplinary hearing adjourned last week to consider his request for a publication ban on evidence. His lawyer said more publicity will taint witnesses.

Exhibit Opens

CALGARY —Alberta Lt.-Gov. Norm Kwong opened an exhibit at Calgary's Beth Tzedec Synagogue last week honouring 100 people, places and groups that have defined Jewish life in southern Alberta since the first permanent Jewish settlers arrived there in 1889. The exhibit, organized by the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta to honour this year's provincial centennial, runs until Dec. 15.

Jews Visit Natives

WINNIPEG — A B'nai Brith Canada delegation visited two native communities in northern Manitoba, Tadoule Lake and Oxford, last week at the invitation of two local grand chiefs. As part of the trip – which included Ronen Gil-Or, deputy head of mission at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa – B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant was made an honorary chief, to recognize B'nai Brith's "outstanding efforts to strengthen the ties between Jewish and aboriginal peoples," Grand Chief Arnold Ouskan said. B'nai Brith led a native mission to Israel in August that met with Israeli officials on cultural and economic issues.

Ambassadors On Tour

VANCOUVER — Jordan's ambassador to Canada, Nabil Barto, and Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador in Ottawa, will appear together on a panel titled "Partners in Peace," Nov. 21 at Vancouver's Temple Shalom. The event, to be moderated by federal cabinet minister Stephen Owen, is part of an effort to encourage peace by attracting trade to the Mideast.

WORLD

JDLer Killed In Jail

PHOENIX — A Jewish Defence League member was killed in jail Nov. 4 when another prisoner hit him on the head with a cement block, authorities said. Earl Krugel, 62, was serving 20 years for his role in a plot to bomb a mosque and the office of an Arab-American congressman. He had been at the medium-security federal prison in Phoenix for three days. Irv Rubin, a JDL leader jailed for the same plot, died in prison in 2002 at what officials call a suicide.

Zundel Trial Postponed Shortly After Starting

MANNHEIM, Germany — The trial of Ernst Zundel, a prominent German Holocaust denier deported from Canada earlier this year, was delayed shortly after it started last Tuesday after the judge dismissed part of his defence team.

Zundel, 66, faces up to five years in jail for charges of inciting racial hatred and denying the Nazis murdered six million Jews.

Judge Ulrich Meinerzhagen ruled that Horst Mahler, a disbarred, far-right lawyer who supports anti-Semitic ideas, could not be part of Zundel's defence team. He also dismissed his publicly appointed defender Sylvia Stolz on the grounds Mahler's ideas were reflected in her submissions to the court.

Zundel, a German national, left Germany in 1958, allegedly to avoid military service. The court says he continues to spread Holocaust denial and anti-Semitic material via the Internet. A judgment is expected Nov. 24 in the case, which the state has been investigating since 1996.

GA delegates excited to 'think about things Jewish'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Some 3,600 Jews from North America, the former Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, Ethiopia and Israel registered for the three-day General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities.

The Metro Toronto Convention Centre was a constant stream of human traffic on Sunday, the first day of the GA, as more than 650 volunteers recruited by the conference's host, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, helped direct delegates from one event to another in the spacious gathering hall in downtown Toronto.

In the early evening social hour, just before the opening plenary heard an address by Prime Minister Paul Martin, The CJN wandered through the Toronto and Montreal community reception areas and spoke to a number of delegates.

It may have been the "happy hour," or simply the excitement and enthusiasm of large numbers of like-minded people coming together for a common cause, but the mood was unreservedly positive.

The common sentiment was that the GA, which wrapped up earlier this week, provided a great opportunity to exchange ideas and learn about different ways to approach issues.

"The GA gives us all an opportunity to get away from our desks and think about things Jewish. We can also reflect on what we can bring back to our own communities," said Richard Vineberg, president of FEDERATION CJA in Montreal.

Yacov Fruchter, who is involved in outreach for Hillel International in Montreal, said the GA "offers community leaders a chance to learn from each other.

"We brought a delegation of 40 students from Montreal, and by getting together with other Jewish communities, they get to see the bigger picture. They see how the work they do at home, such as raising money from Jewish communities abroad, affects people."

"I have been to [a number] of conferences, and this one is of real value. It is very important for Montreal to see all its young people here," Krosnick said.

"Each Jewish community in North America works non-stop, and it is critical for them to step out to meet people and learn about different ways to deal with issues. It gives us some spiritual sustenance to bring back to our daily work."

Marc Attali, Israel's consul general in Montreal, said the yearly conference is an important link between Israel and the Diaspora.

Eyeing unfolding Middle East events

From the editor's desk

There was last week, as usual, a fast-moving torrent of significant news related to the Middle East, each with potentially far-reaching consequences. It is important that we try at least to note some of them in this space, lest their significance be swept away by the inevitable rushing current this week.

Jordan. The sadistic slaughter by suicide bombers of some 57 people at three hotels in Amman proves yet again the heartless mendacity of Islam's "holy warriors." The Qur'an is their cover, not their justice.

King Abdullah sees through the red-stained transparency of Al Qaeda's blood-lust. Whether, alone, he can root the terrorists out his country's soil is questionable. He will need the support of his population and the assistance of like-minded governments. But that he is determined to do so is beyond question.

The suicide slaughter last week was merely the latest attempt in the campaign by Al Qaeda strongman, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, to topple the Hashemite kingdom.

On the weekend, Jordanian security forces announced a major breakthrough in their investigation of the bombings. They said they had captured a fourth would-be bomber, Sajida Mubarak Atrous al-Rishawi, 35, the sister of the slain former militant Mubarak Atrous al-Rishawi, the former right-hand man of al-Zarqawi, the head of Al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Her capture may be just the thread that could lead to some of the unravelling of al-Zarqawi's blood-soaked terror skein.

Some 17 members of one Palestinian clan in the northern West Bank village of Silet al-Daher were killed by Zarqawi's murderers. Two Palestine Authority officials also lost their lives in an explosion that ripped through the Grand Hyatt hotel.

Inasmuch as Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and much of Fatah share the same methods and aims of Zarqawi's Al Qaeda, could the murders be a tipping point in the official Palestinian attitude towards dismantling the terrorist network within their own turmoiled and roiling midst?

PA President Mahmoud Abbas said of the killers that they "are not Arabs, are not human."

Ha'aretz reported that Palestinian newspaper commentator Hani al-Masri wrote: "I expect now a significant change in the Palestinian political culture... the attacks will persuade Palestinians to reconsider this way of suicide bombings and I think it will reduce support for attacks that kill without differentiation between children, women, wedding parties and ordinary people."

Unfolding events will tell us more.

Iran. In a major story on Sunday of more than 3,000 words, the New York Times reported that the American government had proof that Iran has been lying about its avowed peaceful intentions for its nuclear program.

According to the newspaper, American intelligence officials briefed the International Atomic Energy Agency last July with information they had obtained from a computer belonging to a well-placed Iranian official.

"The Americans flashed on a screen and spread over a conference table selections from more than a thousand pages of Iranian computer simulations and accounts of experiments, saying they showed a long effort to design a nuclear warhead, according to a half-dozen European and American participants in the meeting."

The Americans, not surprisingly, refused to disclose the circumstances surrounding the obtaining of the computer. And of course, their circumspection raised certain suspicions concerning the material's reliability.

But as the article makes clear, "nuclear analysts at the international atomic agency studied the laptop documents and found them to be credible evidence of Iranian strides", European diplomats said. A dozen officials and nuclear weapons experts in Europe and the United States with detailed knowledge of the intelligence said in interviews that they believed it reflected a concerted effort to develop a warhead. "They've worked problems that you don't do unless you're very serious," said a European arms official. "This stuff is deadly serious."

The publication of the story in the Times coincided with the news of the official rejection by Iran of the latest European proposal regarding the Iranian effort to enrich uranium, namely, that it be conducted in Russia.

The board of the international atomic agency plans to meet again on Nov. 24 to wrestle with the issue of Iran's nuclear program. It should decide then whether to send the matter to the Security Council. Cuba and Syria, it should be noted, are members of that board. One does not need a deck of Tarot cards to know how they will vote.

Perhaps the last word on Iran's nuclear ambition should go to Israel's chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz, who reportedly said on Saturday night that Iran's acquisition of nuclear arms would present Israel with "an existential threat."

Unfolding events will tell us more.

Conference recalls historic Vatican document

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jews and Catholics must continue with interfaith dialogue and educate their co-religionists on their historic rapprochement that began a scant 40 years ago, a day-long conference at the University of Toronto heard last week.

After nearly two millennia of hatred, oppression, vilification and annihilation of Jews by Catholics, the last four decades of reconciliation are "just the beginning of the beginning," and there's much work to be done, more than 100 Christian and Jewish participants heard at last Thursday's seminar, which marked the 40th anniversary of a landmark Vatican document that laid the foundation for the Catholic Church's improved relations with non-Christians, especially Jews.

Nostra Aetate, (Latin for "In Our Time"), issued by the historic Second Vatican Council on Oct. 28, 1965, represented a turning point for the Church. The document deplored Christian anti-Semitism, stated that God's covenant with Jews is irrevocable, and repudiated the age-old deicide charge that blamed Jews for the death of Jesus.

As the conference, held at U of T's St. Michael's College, indicated, while the statement was welcome and has had profound effects, there are still many hurdles to overcome in the relationship.

While greeted as positive, North American Jews generally adopted a "wait and see" attitude to Nostra Aetate, remarked Prof. David Novak, a rabbi and U of T expert on Christian-Jewish relations.

But the effect, he said, has been "striking."

Although there has been a resurgence in global anti-Semitism, and even though "there's no doubt certain Christians are anti-Semitic, nonetheless, Christians, especially Roman Catholics, are no longer the source or even the endorser of anti-Semitism," Novak said.

"Anti-Semites are not getting it from the Catholic church."

Another major achievement of Nostra Aetate has been that Catholics no longer missionize to Jews, he added

The Second Vatican Council, which convened from 1962 to 1965 to modernize the church, also abandoned the notion that Judaism is a failed religion that has been replaced by Christianity. More to the point, Novak said, the church shifted to a "soft supersessionism," which teaches that Christianity has not replaced Judaism, but improved it.

In 2000, Novak and three other scholars produced Dabru Emet ("Speak the Truth"), a Jewish response to Nostra Aetate that suggested Jews should view Christians in a better light.

Jews and Catholics must educate their own about the "radical changes" brought about by Nostra Aetate, said Cardinal Edward Cassidy, past president of the Vatican's Commission on Relations with the Jews. "So far, we have failed to bring dialogue to our communities. There is still urgent work to be done in this regard."

Many Jews, he said are "unaware" of the respect and friendship for them that Nostra Aetate produced. "For that, we need education."

Cardinal Cassidy conceded there are stumbling blocks, among them the ongoing debate over the role of war-era pope Pius XII in the Nazi genocide and the Vatican's refusal to completely open its World War II archives.

Opening the archives "will remove suspicions and contribute to a more mature understanding," he said, but he didn't indicate when or if that would happen.

While Jews and Catholics disagree on who is the messiah, what unites them is the shared belief "in an unredeemed world that needs a messiah," Cardinal Cassidy said.

Quoting Cardinal Walter Kasper, who is currently responsible for the Vatican's relations with Jews, Cardinal Cassidy said Nostra Aetate was "just the beginning of the beginning of the process of reconciliation and peace."

A gloomier picture was painted by the chief rabbi of Rome, Riccardo Di Segni, who created a stir last month when he refused to attend a ceremony in Rome marking the 40th anniversary of Nostra Aetate.

Rabbi Di Segni said he snubbed the event because of the presence of one of the keynote speakers, Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger, a Jewish convert to Christianity.

"This is symbolic of a problem" in relations, he said. "What do Christians want from us? Do they want us converted?"

He cited another sore point, the Vatican's canonization of Edith Stein, a Jewish-born nun who was murdered at Auschwitz as a Jew.

"This is not a casual process," Rabbi Di Segni said. "This is a well-directed process."

He said some Catholics refer to Stein as "the new Esther."

There are other problems "every day." He cited the case of a 90-year-old infirm Jewish man in Florence who was baptized. When the local bishop found out, he said it wouldn't happen again.

"This is dialogue?" Rabbi Di Segni asked.

Catholics, he said, tend to regard Jews "like a beautiful piece of silver on a shelf to be shown to guests, but not as a vibrant religious people that has a mission and strength."

The two faiths have had 40 years to implement mutual respect, but Rabbi Di Segni said he can't agree that "the era of suspicion is finished."

The conference was capped by a dinner that featured performances from the St. Michael's Boys Choir and the Renanim Youth Choir.

Rebick leads anti-Sharon protest at Ryerson

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A public protest of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's invitation to speak at the United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto was held last Thursday evening at Ryerson University.

The event, co-sponsored by a new Toronto group called the Coalition Against Israel's War Crimes, made up of various local pro-Palestinian organizations, and journalist and left-wing activist Judy Rebick, who holds Ryerson's CAW-Sam Gindin chair in social justice and democracy, tackled what the coalition's literature called the "political and legal aspects of the upcoming visit of Ariel Sharon to Toronto, Canada's role in sustaining Israeli Apartheid, the current situation of Palestinian refugees, and what we can do to protest Sharon's visit."

The organizers also planned to hold a protest at Metro Hall in Toronto on Nov. 14, the date GA organizers set aside for Sharon to address delegates.

But speaking before The CJN's deadline, Rebick said it was still unknown whether Sharon would come to Canada and whether the second protest would go ahead.

For security reasons, the prime minister routinely announces within 24 hours whether or not he will attend an event.

At a discussion held at Ryerson's Rogers Communications Building, protest organizers screened the controversial 2001 BBC documentary The Accused, which focuses on what they describe as "Israel's war crimes during the invasion of Lebanon in 1982."

"The film suggests that Sharon played a major role in the massacre," said Rebick, who is Jewish.

Regardless of whether Sharon has been proven guilty of war crimes, "he should [not] be exempt from being examined as a war criminal," she said.

"Everyone agrees that war crimes were committed," she added.

Speakers at the Ryerson event included Ahmad Hawarneh, a member of the Coalition Against the Deportation of Palestinian Refugees, and Randa Mouammar from the Coalition Against Israel's War Crimes.

Rebick, the moderator, told The CJN before the event that each panelist would have the floor for about five minutes, and that most of the discussion would come from audience members.

She said she hoped screening the documentary would create good dialogue, because when the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is discussed, "usually people end up screaming at each other."

"This is the kind of discussion we should have on campus," she said.

She added, however, that the event's timing was unfortunate, because of anti-Semitic, anti-Israel pamphlets discovered in the libraries of all three Toronto universities the previous week.

Rebick said she planned "to begin the meeting by making it clear that the discussion has nothing to do with anti-Semitism, and anti-Semitic comments will not be tolerated."

Ryerson spokesperson Bruce Piercey, said Rebik made the request to hold the protest on campus, and the university gave her permission to do so.

He agreed the timing was unfortunate, but he said Rebick's request came well before the discovery of the pamphlets, which he stressed have nothing to do with the protest.

"The university is a venue for a wide-range of ideas and opinions within the limits of the law," Piercey said. "This event is political within the bounds of public discussion."

Josh Hacker, Hillel's engagement co-ordinator at Ryerson, said that although members of Hillel would welcome Sharon to Toronto and the GA, they recognize that people have the right to freely express their views for or against any political policy.

He said he disagrees with the accusations against Sharon and Israel, noting they've been around for a long time.

"Unfortunately, these are not new accusations against Ariel Sharon, and he has had to deal with them for 20 years now," Hacker said.

JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF TORONTO is proud to invite the Toronto Community to the 2005 NEGEV DINNER TRIBUTE in honour of
JOSEPH AND WOLF LEBOVIC
in recognition of excellence in communal leadership and dedication to Israel

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 27
Sheraton Centre Hotel
Reception: 5:00 p.m. • Dinner: 6:00 p.m.

A random draw at the Negev Dinner will provide two FREE return economy tickets to Israel, compliments of El Al Israel Airlines. To qualify for this draw, donors must make a minimum gift to this year's Negev Dinner of at least $360 and purchase at least one ticket to the event itself.

The JNF New Leadership Division invites guests ages 25-45 to participate in the Negev Dinner, attend a special Pre-Dinner Cocktail Reception and meet with prominent guests attending the Dinner. Please call Sheila at Ext 30 to confirm your attendance.

Proceeds from the 2005 JNF Toronto Negev Dinner will be used to build a much-needed Reservoir at Lachish, near the city of Kiryat Gat in the northern Negev. It will be known as The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Reservoir and will provide essential water resources, primarily for agricultural purposes, to the farming areas in the vicinity of Lachish. Through the generosity of Joseph and Wolf Lebovic and those attending this year's Negev Dinner, this project will become a reality.

More than statements, standards of measurement

Cynics might dismiss Prime Minister Paul Martin's appearance in Toronto last weekend at the opening plenary session of the 74th annual General Assembly of United Jewish Communities as nothing higher than politicking. After all, he spoke to the very large gathering of some 3,600 delegates and 650 volunteers on the very day that the leaders of the three opposition parties had apparently cemented the imminent sinking of the prime minister's minority government.

Non-cynics, however, and Liberal party loyalists to be sure, will point out that the prime minister's commitment to address the assembly preceded, by a considerable period of time, the opposition parties' vote of confidence manoeuvring, and that, in any event, the majority of the assembly participants – although not the volunteers, all of whom were from the Toronto area – were ineligible to vote in Canada. But whether cynic or loyalist, Canadians are now effectively in the run-up to an election campaign, if not shortly in the very thing itself.

Martin spoke unambiguously about Canada's relationship with Israel. "Israel's values are Canada's values," he said. It is therefore entirely appropriate that the community regard his pronouncements as standards of measurement as much as statements of intent.

After stating that Israel's disengagement from Gaza this past summer was but the "first step in a long and difficult journey towards peace," he added that "Canada can be counted on to support Israel's search for peace." Then, in a direct allusion to the president of Iran's "hateful speech" directed at the Jewish state two weeks ago, he added that Canada "will not tolerate threats to this peace. When you attack the State of Israel, you attack what for many people is the very soul of the Jewish people. The world cannot ignore the Iranian president's threat."

The threat was particularly dangerous, Martin pointed out, because it joins a macabre enthusiasm for genocide with an angry obsession to develop nuclear weapons.

Speaking earlier in the day at the assembly, Minister of Justice Irwin Cotler suggested how the world might respond to the Iranian president. "Iran must be held accountable," Cotler said. "An urgent session of the Security Council must be called" to establish that accountability. Perhaps Canada could spearhead any attempt to bring Iran before that bar of accountability?

The prime minister also said, "We will continue to press for reforms at the United Nations that will prevent the politicization of the organization" resulting in the routine of anti-Israel resolutions at the General Assembly. He might therefore usefully instruct the Canadian ambassador to the UN to actually vote against the anti-Israel resolutions as well as in support of any potentially beneficial UN reforms.

"Jewish communities around the world can count on Canada," Martin promised. As elections approach, the Canadian Jewish community will soon be putting that promise to the test.

The anti-Nazi committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, joined other minority groups in trying to combat the activities of the Ku Klux Klan. The KKK had been trying to raise its profile in the province by various means, including distributing hate literature to high school students.

Canada and Syria

As a member of the Canadian-Lebanese community, I welcome your support for a Lebanon free from the oppressive forces of Syria and Iran ("Tremor in Damascus," editorial, CJN, Oct. 27). However, by assuming that only America, Israel and the United Nations have a role to play, you are missing someone who wishes to be a key player in the Middle East – Canada.

A few days before former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri's murder in February 2005, Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew visited Lebanon and Syria, bestowing official recognition on the Assad regime and its Lebanese puppets, while ignoring the Lebanese opposition. Prime Minister Paul Martin went further, publicly declaring that the Syrians were in Lebanon "to keep the peace."

At that time, the Canadian Coalition for Democracies told Pettigrew that Syria has been listed many times over as a state promoter of terrorism in Israel, Lebanon, Iraq and across the Middle East, and it urged him to send a strong message that Canada does not support Syria's promotion of terrorism and its occupation of Lebanon.

Pettigrew ignored the warning and chose to befriend the Syrian dictator and delegitimize Hariri and the democratic Lebanese opposition.

It is now public information that prosecutor Detlev Mehlis' report to the UN Security Council directly connects Syrian dictator Bashar Assad to the murder of Hariri.

Martin should start by recalling Canada's ambassador from Damascus; ending all political, military and strategic support for the Assad regime; and finally, ensuring that Canada leads the international effort to have the International Criminal Court charge Assad and his advisers for the murder of Hariri.

If Canada's foreign policy in the Middle East is to have any credibility, we must begin by bringing Assad to justice.

Recall ambassador from Tehran

The United Nations Security Council had no choice but to unanimously condemn Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call for the destruction of Israel. To do otherwise would have been in complete violation of the UN Charter. I would wager, however, that if the same resolution was put before the UN General Assembly, there would not be a unanimous endorsement because of the blind hatred so many Middle Eastern countries have for Israel in particular and Jews generally.

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew vigorously condemned the remarks made by Iran's president, but in my view, that was not enough. He should have recalled the Canadian ambassador from Tehran and expelled Iran's ambassador to Canada. Canada and the UN Security Council should demand an immediate apology from the Iranian government, and if it is not forthcoming, impose economic and diplomatic sanctions.

The melody of Kol Nidrei

The very beautiful melody that Cantor Deborah Staiman describes as "the traditional Ashkenazi melody heard in synagogues today," was composed by Luigi Boccherini and Max Bruch for the Cello Concerto in B Flat Major and Kol Nidrei, Opus 47 ("The power of Kol Nidrei," CJN, Oct. 14).

I have, for many years, had a tape of the concerto played by Ofra Harnoy. Her rendition of this composition is so moving and beautiful that it makes one feel transcendental. I listen to it often, all year round. I can never fill myself with its emotion.

Parts of the concerto are said to have been "borrowed" from Beethoven. I do not find them easily identifiable and I am not certain where they occur.

ORT Canada research project

I would like to correct one statement in "Survivors credit ORT schools with changing their lives" (CJN, Nov. 10).

The article said that the Holocaust survivors I interviewed for the ORT Canada research project "attended or taught at ORT schools in such places as Morocco, Israel or Iran during or after World War II." For the project, I interviewed people who were living in Iran, Morocco and Israel in the 1950s and attended ORT schools there. However, the survivors attended ORT classes in the Kovno ghetto in Lithuania, France, Austria, Germany, Hungary, Italy, etc.

I also think it's important to inform the public that World ORT in London is doing similar research and asking that Holocaust survivors who have a history with ORT contact researcher Sarah Kavanough at World ORT, 126 Albert Street, London NW1 7NE, U.K.; telephone +44 (0)20 7446 8510; e-mail dp.project@ort.org

Israel weighs its options on Iran

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

When the International Atomic Energy Agency convenes in Vienna later this month, it will be under intense pressure to take action against Iran's nuclear program.

Since the last IAEA meeting in September, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has called for Israel to be "wiped off the map," his scientists are threatening to produce weapons-grade uranium and Tehran's talks with European union representatives on the nuclear issue remain deadlocked.

All this has led to international calls for steps to stop Iran going nuclear.

The most likely IAEA action will be to refer Iran's violations of its nuclear commitments to the United Nations Security Council, a move that could result in stringent economic sanctions. But for that to happen, China and Russia, as permanent members of the Security Council with veto powers, would have to go along. So far, it's not clear that they would.

In Israel, there have been calls for a more assertive anti-Iranian policy in the wake of Ahmadinejad's call for Israel's destruction. And while Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz is careful to say Israel is not considering any military option "today," he does not rule out a military strike in the future if diplomacy fails.

"I believe we should make our best effort to achieve the maximum we could achieve by diplomatic channels, before thinking about other channels," Mofaz said in a recent interview with Newsweek.

Calling Iran to account for its nuclear plans will not be easy.

Battered and bruised by the war in Iraq, the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush has no stomach for a direct confrontation with another huge Muslim state. Moreover, it's relying on Shiite Iran to help set up a Shiite-dominated democracy in Iraq.

The United States, therefore, would prefer to sit back and watch the three main players in the European Union – Britain, Germany and France – negotiate an agreement on the nuclear issue with Iran.

The trouble is that with only a week to go before the next IAEA board meeting in Vienna, the Iranians and the EU-3 aren't on speaking terms. In the absence of a diplomatic agreement, the United States and Europeans are likely to push for a strong IAEA resolution, referring the issue to the Security Council.

What happens then depends largely on Russia and China. Either could veto a move to impose economic sanctions on Iran: Russia, because of the hard currency it earns from sales of sophisticated technology to Iran, and China, because it's a large customer for Iranian oil.

But they will be under pressure from the United States and EU to help curb Iran's nuclear ambitions. The Europeans are showing increasing signs of impatience with Iran, especially after Ahmadinejad's statement on Israel, with the Italians playing a leading role. Italian Foreign Minister Gianfranco Fini accused Ahmadinejad of fuelling terrorism against Israel.

"Not recognizing Israel's right to exist is an incentive for terrorism because the moment you don't recognize a state's right to exist, you don't recognize a people's right to exist," he declared in a recent interview with Corriere della Sera.

Fini urged Iran to be fully transparent about its nuclear plans, because no one wants to isolate Iran or take military action. In Israel last week, Fini said Italy would like to see the Iranian nuclear issue referred to the Security Council.

The IAEA board of governors is scheduled to meet in Vienna on Nov. 24.

In its last resolution, passed in late September, the IAEA found Iran guilty of "non-compliance" and spoke of Iran's "history of concealment" while warning that next time it might well refer the issue to the UN Security Council.

The fact the Iranians have ignored a long list of IAEA demands made in September – for example, that Iran be open about its nuclear plans, suspend uranium enrichment or conversion programs, reconsider plans for a heavy water reactor, ratify and implement a protocol on nuclear non-proliferation, provide for spot checks of nuclear facilities and get back to a negotiating process with he EU – makes a move to the Security Council all the more likely.

That's the course of action Israel would like to see, as Mofaz noted with Newsweek.

"I believe today we should make the best effort in the diplomatic channel. And there is a chance that by putting pressure on Iran, a decision in the UN Security Council will delay or stop an Iranian nuclear capability," Mofaz said.

According to Mofaz, Iran is still at least a few years away from the point of no return in uranium enrichment, which would enable it to produce a nuclear bomb. Therefore, he feels there still is a limited window of opportunity for diplomacy – but he implies that if Iran gets closer to producing a bomb, that window will close.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

When Mofaz says that "a military option is not on the agenda today," the emphasis clearly is on the word "today."

Still, in the wake of the Ahmadinejad statement, some usually sanguine analysts would like to see Israel taking a more overtly activist line. In an article entitled, "Hitler from Tehran," Ha'aretz's veteran military analyst Ze'ev Schiff writes that "the call for Israel's annihilation adds a more acute dimension to the nuclear dispute, one that does not exist, for instance, in the nuclear dispute with North Korea."

Short of a declaration of war on Iran, Schiff suggests that Israel reconsider its policy of sitting on the sidelines, waiting for the international community to act.

"Israel has good levers for applying pressure on Iran," he says, "for example, by aiding the Kurds and the mujahedin who oppose the regime."

Schiff says Israel also should continue building a strike force capable of taking out Iranian nuclear installations, even if the wisdom of ever using it is dubious.

Clearly, the prospect of a nuclear bomb in the hands of a regime led by Ahmadinejad and the fundamentalist ayatollahs worries the entire international community, and Israel more than most. The question is whether Iran's nuclear drive can be stopped by anything other than force – and, if it comes to force, will only Israel be ready to use it?

Then again, it's possible that Ahmadinejad's blunt talk simply called the West's bluff. Without effective diplomacy or a genuine military option, will Israel and the world just have to get used to the idea of a new balance of power when it comes to Iran?

President's genocidal call must be confronted

By MARVIN KURZ

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's recent rant calling for Israel to be "wiped off the map" brings to mind Randy Newman's satiric song Political Science, which opined that the atom bomb posed the answer to every political issue:

"No one likes us, I don't know why
We may not be perfect but heaven knows we try
But all around, even our old friends are putting us down
Let's drop the big one and see what happens."

While Newman's words could have been written for the neophyte Iranian leader, few people are laughing. Numerous nations, and even the UN Security Council, immediately condemned the statement. When one considers the world body's usual pattern of denunciation of, and discrimination against, the Jewish state, this development is a sanguine one. But the Security Council's condemnation lacked either teeth or an explicit recognition of the transgression posed by the statement: the president of a member state was advocating the mass murder of his Jewish neighbours.

Our own prime minister's comments on the issue were equally problematic. Paul Martin described the Iranian leader's words as reflecting "lack of respect, intolerance and anti-Semitism… out of an era that is long past." While Martin's comments helpfully underscore the link between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism, they ignore three important points.

First, Ahmadinejad's outburst was not mere "intolerance." It was a crime against both Canadian and international law. Advocacy of genocide violates section 319 (1) of the Canadian Criminal Code. Under Canadian law, an offender can be punished by up to five years in prison for such an utterance. As a recent Supreme Court of Canada decision demonstrates, advocacy of genocide is also a crime against humanity. People who commit this crime abroad can be barred or deported from Canada. Under our new Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act, they can even theoretically be tried in Canada.

The second point Martin ignores is that such threats are not, as the prime minister hopefully suggests, a thing of the past. They reflect common discourse in the Middle East. Hatred of Israel is regularly fanned in media outlets, including state-controlled newspapers such as Egypt's Al Ahram and regional all-news television stations such as Al Jazeera and Al Arabiya. This hatred gives oxygen to enemies of peace and encourages them to bomb rather than negotiate.

But the point overlooked by Martin that causes the greatest concern is the Iranian leader's ability to carry out his criminal threats. While many in the Middle East have been calling for Israel's destruction (Ahmadinejad was, after all, speaking at a conference – titled "A World Without Zionism" – that was premised on that idea), he is one of the few people in the Middle East with the means to make good on such a threat.

Iran is one of the most powerful nations in its part of the world. It has a large and powerful army, financed by an oil-glutted treasury. Just a generation ago, Iran proved itself willing to engage in a seven-year war with a neighbour, Iraq, that saw an estimated million people killed. If Iran were willing to suffer such a war with its Muslim cousins, what about its Jewish enemies? It already engages in conflict by proxy with Israel. It bankrolls terror groups that are sworn to Israel's destruction such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah. But try as they may, these groups cannot, by themselves, wipe out Israel. Iran, though, may be only a few steps away from acquiring the capacity to do so. It appears hell-bent on obtaining and exporting the capacity to build nuclear weapons. Its nuclear ambitions and prevarications are placing it on a collision course with the UN's Nobel Prize-winning International Atomic Energy Agency. Thus, Ahmadinejad may be the first person to combine the threat to wipe out the State of Israel with the actual capacity to do so.

Luckily, there is a silver lining in this dark cloud. The chorus of condemnations from Western and Muslim leaders alike appear to have given Ahmadinejad some pause. Even Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, distanced himself from his president. After a meeting between the two men, a seemingly chastened Ahmadinejad spoke with an uncharacteristically conciliatory tone. He articulated the need to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict through elections and recognition. Absent was further talk of genocide.

This incident offers important lessons. Hate speech in the Middle East, like the hate speech that preceded the Holocaust and the Rwandan genocide, can have fatal consequences. However, it becomes far harder to incite mass murder when authorities refuse to sanction such talk. Hopefully Ahmadinejad will content himself with, and stop at, Randy Newman's satiric fantasy:

"They don't like us anyhow
So lets drop the big one now
Lets drop the big one now."

Zwi Migdal ring preyed on Jewish women

Shalom Aleichem, in his Yiddish short story The Man from Buenos Aires, wrote about a Jewish salesman from Argentina named Motek who was coy about the goods he sold. "I supply the world with merchandise, something that everybody knows and nobody speaks of," Motek said obliquely. "What do I deal in? Not in prayer books, my friend, not in prayer books."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When T*he Man from Buenos Aires* was published in the early 20th century, men like the mysterious Motek, impeccably dressed and bejewelled, were riding high. Purveyors of the flesh trade, and members of a mainly Jewish criminal gang known as Zwi Migdal, which thrived from the 1860s to the 1930s, they were white slavers who preyed on young, impressionable, impoverished Jewish women from the backward shtetls and teeming ghettos of eastern Europe who dreamed of a better future in the Americas.

Promised work in factories or homes, or supposedly betrothed to the well-mannered visitors who lavished flattery and gifts upon them, these women were duped into prostitution in South America and the United States.

In Bodies and Souls (Random House Canada), Canadian journalist Isabel Vincent delves into that nether world of broken dreams, sordid brothels and tropical sunsets and produces a fascinating social history as partly seen from the perspective of three such women, Sophia Chamys, Rachel Liberman and Rebecca Freedman.

Vincent, an investigative reporter on the staff of the National Post until recently and the author of Hitler's Silent Partners: Swiss Banks, Nazi Gold, and the Pursuit of Justice, culled her material from archives, academic studies and interviews. Bodies and Souls is the first book I've read on this relatively little-known topic, but it has been the subject of monographs and newspaper articles, some in Portuguese.

At the height of its influence after World War I, Zwi Migdal controlled bordellos around the globe, from New York to Shanghai. But the focus of its activities was in South America, particularly in cities such as Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires, which had fairly substantial Jewish communities.

Vincent estimates that Zwi Migal operated some 3,000 brothels in Argentina, most in Buenos Aires, and many in Rio. But lest the wrong impression is conveyed, she points out that Jewish criminals hardly had a monopoly on the international white-slave trade. Japanese and Chinese criminal gangs played the biggest role in the trafficking of women, but the venal gangsters in Zwi Migdal were not exactly minor players.

Although legions of Jewish women recruited by Zwi Migdal had no inkling of what awaited them overseas, many knew what to expect. Indeed, some became brothel owners and recruiters.

Not surprisingly, the Jewish community shunned the white slavers and prostitutes. They were banned from joining communal institutions, synagogues and burial societies. Jewish restaurants discouraged their patronage, while Jewish theatregoers were liable to leave their seats if they found themselves next to an "unclean" person.

Ostracized by their fellow Jews, the prostitutes in Rio formed their own burial society, the Jewish Benevolent and Burial Association, popularly known as the Society of Truth. In 1916, they bought land for their cemetery in the grimy suburb of Inhauma, which Vincent visited while researching this book. There she found 797 graves, all badly maintained, the last of which were installed in the 1970s.

Farther north, in Rio, Jewish prostitutes acquired a downtown building in the 1940s that they converted into a synagogue and administrative offices. According to Vincent, organizations along the lines of the Society of Truth were established in Sao Paulo, Buenos Aires and New York, but they were largely run by the pimps.

Zwi Migdal, which had its origins in Poland, emerged in the 1890s under the guise of the Warsaw Jewish Mutual Aid Society, just as the white-slave trade was taking off. A coalition of independent white slavers functioning as a corporation with a board of directors, Zwi Migdal spread its tentacles to Argentina, Brazil, India, South Africa and China. By the turn of the 19th century, they controlled thousands of women and turned annual profits of more than $50 million, a fabulous sum back then.

Claiming that they were not common criminals, Vincent says they had a bevy of lawyers at their disposal and bribed officials from ship stewards to government bureaucrats and police chiefs.

Under pressure from the Jewish community and the Polish embassy in Buenos Aires, which resented that a trade organization of pimps had been named after Poland's capital, Argentina ordered a government official, Martin Perez Estrada, to investigate the Warsaw Jewish Mutual Aid Society.

Estrada, who had been on the pimps' payroll for years, finished his investigation in a only a week. His conclusion was that its members were upstanding citizens and beyond reproach. Argentina shelved his report, but when the Polish authorities complained to the foreign ministry, the pimps reacted with alacrity. They changed the society's name to Zwi Migdal ("the great power" in Yiddish), in honour of Luis Migdal, one of the society's earliest benefactors, whom respectable Jews considered a dreg of humanity.

Zwi Migdal representatives roamed eastern Europe far and wide, proffering gullible Jewish women allegedly decent jobs and proposals of marriage. "Believe me, these poor souls are waiting for me as though I were the Messiah," crows Motek in The Man from Buenos Aires.

Sophia Chamys, who shared a one-room thatch-roofed house with her parents and younger sister on the outskirts of Warsaw, was one of the victims whose story of hope and deprivation Vincent relates with aplomb. Like so many women of her class, Chamys married the pimp who passed himself off as a prosperous businessman. She wed him in a ceremony commonly referred to in Yiddish as a stille chupah, or "silent wedding."

These ritual marriages, Vincent explains, had absolutely no validity under civil law and suited the pimps. The stille chupah, which had been outlawed in some jurisdictions, entrapped ignorant women and robbed them of their civil rights. Typically, pimps travelled from shtetl to shtetl and acquired multiple wives in such ceremonies. In tow with their new "wives," the pimps boarded ships bound for South America. During the voyage, the pimps told them that they would work as prostitutes. If they resisted, they were beaten and raped.

Pimps lived the good life. Concerned with their appearance, they wore tailored suits, silk shirts, gold tie pins and diamond rings, applied fragrant oil to their hair and indulged themselves in pedicures.

The richest ones posed as legitimate businessmen, mostly as jewellers, tobacconists and clothing vendors. And they were terribly conceited. Vincent quotes one pimp as boasting, "The profession of pimp is nothing for an ordinary man to undertake. We must be administrators, instructors, comforters and experts in hygiene. We need self-possession, a knowledge of character, insights, kindness, firmness and self-denial; and above all things, perseverance."

An Argentine police report Vincent cites notes that Zwi Migdal was "set up like a commercial enterprise based on mathematical calculations and financial forecasts. These people are incredibly disciplined; they think of everything and pay a great deal of attention to the tiniest details."

The prostitutes in their thrall led miserable lives. In the filthy casitas of La Boca, a working-class district in Buenos Aires, they serviced upward of 70 men a day, and comported themselves with sadness, a French journalist wrote. More often than not, they had to hand over their initial earnings to pimps to reimburse them for the cost of their passage across the seas.

In Rio, their services were sought out mainly by sailors, small businessmen and new immigrants. Wealthier men, from captains of industry to politicians, gravitated toward French prostitutes. When the first of the Jewish women from Poland arrived in Rio, the red-light district in Mangue was dominated by blacks. They had only recently gained their freedom from slavery, which was abolished in Brazil in 1888.

The desperate poverty of New York's Lower East Side fed Zwi Migdal's appetite as well. The majority of Jewish prostitutes there toiled in so-called "50 cent and dollar" houses unfit for human habitation.

During the 1930s, the police in Argentina began cracking down on Jewish pimps, charging them with "illicit association" under the criminal code. In the face of constant raids, they fled to Uruguay and Brazil, transferring their operations to Brazil, Mexico, Cuba, Venezuela and Colombia. Zwi Migdal would never again attain the kind of unrivalled power and influence it wielded in Argentina. But the legacy it left behind remains a stain on modern Jewish history.

Opinions

The big question

I've been watching a fascinating TV series called Intervention, which shows addicts as they indulge in reckless, self-abusive behavior, then films their friends and families organizing interventions to push them into rehabilitation.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

I actually identified with the addicts. They were stockbrokers, actresses, valedictorians – good people who allowed their lives to get untracked.

I'm no psychologist, but I think people who lose their way, like the addicts on Intervention, get untracked because they've missed a stage on the road of life.

The first stage is self-love. Our parents teach it to most of us by fussing over us as babies, even though babies are selfish and demanding. They teach us that we're unconditionally deserving of love.

Without self-love, we're lost.

Rabbi Abraham Twerski, a psychiatrist and addiction expert, often asks addicts where they put their household garbage. "In the garbage can," they reply. "Well then," he asks, "why are you putting this garbage into yourself? You're not a garbage can, are you?"

That's exactly the point: without self love, we might as well eat garbage.

Life's second stage is self-discipline. Starting in nursery school, we're taught the basic rules of discipline: Don't bite. Share. Respect your teachers.

In our era of unprecedented comfort, self-discipline is a challenge. Ironically, our comfortable lives have made us weaker. Because we're sheltered, we find it difficult to cope with crises. Even worse, we've become whiny and self-indulgent. We're outraged if we wait too long in line, or if restaurant food is a bit cold. In this environment, self-discipline is a foreign concept. Yet without it, we're vulnerable to dangerous whims. After all, why not have fun now and pay the price later?

The third stage of life is meaning.

What is meaning? It's a life lived beyond the selfish.

There is a story about a follower of Rav Schneur Zalman, the first Lubavitcher Rebbe. As is the chassidic custom, the chassid brought a long list of personal requests for the Rebbe to pray for on his behalf. Surveying the list, the Rebbe sent the chassid away, saying: "You've given a great deal of thought to your needs. Have you thought at all about why you are needed?"

Remarkably, the chassid was overjoyed with this sharp riposte: his Rebbe reminded him that he is needed!

We know what we need: more clothing, electronics, cars, vacations. But on a daily basis, yesterday's desires simply aren't enough. So we search for newer, more exciting thrills, and eventually, such self-destructive things as drugs are not unthinkable.

God put us here for a reason.

To find our way on the road of life, we must answer the ultimate question: Why are we needed?

Israel headlines I'd like to see

An extended stay in Israel through the Jewish holidays gave me ideas for many headlines that we will probably never see in our crisis-oriented, sensationalist media. Wouldn't it be great to read about the following, in order to balance out journalists' caricature of Israel as a violent, tense, divided society:

• 1 million tourists visit Jerusalem in summer, discovering modern museums teaching powerful lessons

Jerusalem's museums keep getting better and better. The new Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial Museum – which averaged 6,000 to 8,000 daily visitors this past summer – is awe-inspiring. The new exhibits personalize stories of many victims while conveying the enormity of the Europeans' crime. Yad Vashem challenges visitors with profound questions about good and evil rather than seeking quick intellectual, emotional or philosophical fixes. Across town, the new, interactive, Menachem Begin Heritage Center, which recently welcomed its 100,000th visitor, uses the story of Israel's first Likud prime minister to teach about his lifelong commitment to nationalism, democracy, Judaism, and personal integrity.

Gil Troy in Montreal

• Children run freely – and safely on Jerusalem's streets

Young Jerusalemites roam further and more independently than children in Montreal, one of North America's safest cities. Israel remains sufficiently intimate, child-friendly and busy-bodyish that parents trust people on the street to protect their kids, if necessary.

• Conservative and Reform schools encourage religious centrism and pluralism

Bridging Israel's religious gap, the remarkable TALI program helps 50 schools throughout Israel offer a positive and substantive Judaic education to more than 22,000 Israeli students, and the Troy family can vouch personally for the warmth, educational effectiveness and beautiful Jewish soul of Jerusalem's TALI Bayit VaGan. TALI, the Hebrew acronym for "enriched Jewish studies," is a project of the Masorti (Israeli Conservative) movement and the Schechter Institute. Israel's Reform movement also offers a wonderful Jewish education to preschoolers at its "gan" in its Bet Shmuel Jerusalem headquarters.

• Youth movements remain vibrant and relevant in Israel

While Israelis have been "malled," North American style, and become increasingly individualistic, consumerist and selfish, a significant minority of Israeli kids remain involved in youth movements. Israeli culture remains more hospitable to such communal activism, making the members feel less marginalized – and proud of their important social and educational functions.

• Tzedakah projects abound in middle class Israel

Israeli philanthropy is far less formalized than the North American Jewish fundraising machine, yet Israelis fund hundreds of tzedakah initiatives that fight poverty, aid terror victims and improve schools, among other things. Even the many Israelis drowning in perpetual overdraft somehow figure out how to help their neighbours.

My family attended an Erev Yom Kippur service organized by Tzohar, one of Israel's many bridge-building groups. Rabbis shrouded in white prayed next to young Israelis with flimsy kippot perched awkwardly on their heads. (My children were thrilled because we sat next to the great Jewish hero, Natan Sharansky, who symbolizes a constructive religious centrism in Israel. Sharansky spent years sporting an army cap after his liberation from Soviet prisons, triggering debates about whether this balding icon covered his head because he feared God – or sunburn).

• Silence descends as pedestrians and cyclists replace cars on Yom Kippur

On Yom Kippur, a hush came over the entire country. Even the overwhelming majority of chiloni – or supposedly secular – Israelis avoided driving. Everyone delighted as highways and major thoroughfares became pedestrian walkways filled with promenading pray-ers and beaming bicyclists.

• Israel awash in holiday spirit – for Sukkot

Christmastime is not the only time when the holiday spirit overtakes a whole society, as people drag lumber, greenery and decorations all over town. The rabbis say the amount of joy a Jew experiences during Sukkot determines the entire year's quotient of happiness. In Jerusalem, our cups overflowed. From wild post-midnight dancing in Mea Shearim to the many concerts entertaining thousands throughout Israel during the school vacation, the exhilaration was palpable – and infectious.

• One non-Israel related headline: Professor admits error

In my previous column, I foolishly called the lulav, the palm branch, the Sukkot symbol that lacks taste or smell. My agricultural illiteracy ignored the delectable dates of said palm tree. I sentence myself to five penitential lashes from the less-prickly arava (willow) which lacks taste and smell.

I also challenge anyone who might now doubt this column's accuracy to try visiting Israel – to judge for yourselves!

Why hate groups target students

In what appears to be a co-ordinated effort, anti-Semitic brochures were placed on the campuses of three Toronto universities during Holocaust Education Week. Apparently produced by white supremacist organizations in the United States, the pamphlets were found in the libraries of York University and Ryerson University, and at all three University of Toronto campuses. All three schools strongly condemned this material as hateful and contrary to Canadian values. Administrators promptly searched for and removed all the pamphlets, and they are working with Toronto police to identify its disseminators.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The placement of anti-Semitic propaganda at these Toronto institutions is part of longstanding attempts by hate groups to target university students. Why do they find students so enticing?

I was reminded of an incident that occurred when I taught at an American university in the late 1990s. Bradley Smith, an active Holocaust denier, tried to place an ad in thousands of student newspapers in universities across the United States. Most newspapers rejected the ad, citing policies against racism and hate speech. But a few papers ran it. Some defiantly proclaimed freedom of the press. Some simply accepted the ad without taking account of its contents.

My university was hit with a double whammy. Not only did our campus paper's advertising manager accept the ad, but, when an expected article did not come through, the editors accepted a guest column from Smith just before going to press.

The case gained notoriety, as several national newspapers focused on it. Initially, the student editors dug in their heels and defended publishing the ad and column. They cited freedom of press, as though the term meant that newspapers have no freedom to reject anything, but are bound to give space to any and every crackpot and odious view. Eventually, the newspaper apologized for the decisions it made. The university's Center for Jewish Studies worked with its journalism professors to help the paper develop clear and appropriate policies regarding hate speech.

The leaflets placed recently on Toronto campus did not necessarily require similar student co-operation in their dissemination. But this incident, too, reminds us that hate groups find university students to be an irresistible target. As the earlier episode indicates, the people who spread hate speech calculatingly play on the healthy skepticism and natural rebelliousness of young people. They believe that as students begin to question and reevaluate some of the assumptions of the adult world, they may be open to arguments that tell them that everyone else has lied to them – suppressed the truth, for example, about just how scurrilous Jews, blacks or immigrants truly are.

This focus on university campuses is an act that shows the ultimate disrespect for students. The promulgators of such material count on student ignorance of history and current events. They bank on students lacking the critical skills needed to evaluate their material and identify it for what it is.

The brochure distributed recently at the Toronto universities, for example, attempted to appeal to blacks and Arabs by denigrating Jewish involvement in the American civil rights movement as being motivated only by self-interest, and by citing the evils of the State of Israel as evidence of true Jewish intent.

At the same time, the writer of the brochure cannot conceal his contempt for all "non-white" people: the civil rights movement created "moral turmoil" that undermined the social fabric of the United States; "Racial pluralism" weakened the "American nation," by which the author means white Christians. It's clear that, while the pamphlet denigrates Jews specifically, the organizations that back the pamphlet are no friends to any race or ethnicity other than their own.

These organizations are looking to widen their support base by appealing to new constituencies. They are reaching out to Canadian university campuses, and to minorities that may be in social or political conflict with Jews or Jewish communities. And it's no wonder. The organizations are in crisis. David Duke, for example, a known Holocaust denier and white supremacist whose website is listed on the brochure, was recently released from prison after serving time for misappropriating the funds of his own organization.

The groups promoted in the leaflet found on the campuses of our local universities are betting that Canadian students are manipulable, malleable, stupid and uninformed. I'm wagering that they're wrong.

Campaign 2006 reaches an impressive $43 million

Pulitzer Prize winner Bob Woodward shares thoughts on Iraq war

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

UJA Federation recently celebrated the outstanding achievement of having already raised $43 million for Campaign 2006, at its annual Major Gifts Dinner. Over 600 community members attended the event held at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel which featured keynote speaker, Pulitzer Prize winning journalist Bob Woodward who spoke about the impact of the Iraq War on U.S. president George W. Bush.

Along with fellow reporter Carl Bernstein, Woodward earned The Washington Post a Pulitzer Prize in 1973 for their reporting on the infamous Watergate scandal. Woodward is the author of The Secret Man, which discusses "Deep Throat," the source who uncovered Watergate during Richard Nixon's presidency.

"Nothing is more relevant now in America than the Iraq war," Woodward said. "It is topic A, B, and C. It is the emotional centre of where Americans are at. Bush is a strong supporter of Israel in a meaningful way," he continued. "But the Iraqi war has sucked all the energy out of everything. The result of the war in Iraq will greatly affect the US's relationship with Israel."

The UJA Federation Campaign 2006 commitment to social justice was clearly illustrated at the event through large table displays of winter clothing items which replaced the usual floral arrangements. After the dinner these items were donated to Jewish Family & Child Service - a UJA Federation partner agency offering Toronto's unfortunate and at risk Jews a much needed helping hand during the cold winter months ahead.

The concept of working with those in our community, in Israel and around the world who are in need, was echoed by the dinner chairs, David Feldberg and Ken Tanenbaum and the chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2006, Honey Sherman and Warren Kimel.

"It may seem sometimes as if the challenges Jews face are too great for one individual alone to make an impact," Kimel said. "But it is what we do collectively that changes lives; it is the impact we have together that makes the Toronto community one to be envied world-wide."

New education policy advisor

In its ongoing attempts to secure permanent and equitable government funding for Jewish day schools in Ontario, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, has announced the hiring of Montreal native Jesse Guberman as an Education Policy Advisor.

In his new role, Guberman, 29 - who will be working in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto - is responsible for strategic planning issues related to school funding.

The Miles Nadal JCC - a true success story

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

What a difference a year makes.

When the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC) reopened on November 1, 2004 there were just 700 members.

This was the loyal core that had stuck with the MNJCC through two-and-a-half years of renovations that thanks to UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, transformed the corner of Bloor and Spadina into a centre for downtown Jewish life.

Today, an unprecedented 2,800 members enjoy the centre's fitness centre, children's programs, and cultural life. That figure is especially remarkable considering that the membership projection for the first year was just 1,800.

So how did the new and improved Nadal JCC manage to attract more than 2,000 new members in just one year?

Executive Director Ellen Cole credits the centre's inclusiveness and sense of community.

"Everyone in the building believes that this is their home," she says. That "everyone" includes elderly Jews who have been members of the centre - in its various incarnations - for decades, young families who live in the area, even non-Jews looking for a quick workout.

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre boasts a membership of nearly 3,000.

"There's more diversity now then there ever was and I think it's wonderful," says Annabelle Goodman, who has been a member for five years. "I love that it's a community. People come from everywhere - it serves a lot of needs."

The new JCC that plays host to this diverse group is a 114,000 square foot building that houses an athletic facility, a theatre, schools, and cultural activities.

According to Jacqueline Friedland, president of the JCC's board of directors, the result is a centre that honours the past while building for the future. "It's the same in terms of the love and haymishe feeling, but its improved in terms of its professionalism," she says. "This ensures its future."

With three children in the JCC's nursery and after-school program, Friedland and her family are in the building almost every day of the week. She's made friends through the JCC, and says that the deeper social connection even extends to the locker room. "There's a different feeling in how people look out for one another," says Friedland, who is also a member of Sports Clubs of Canada.

Goodman calls it a "bonus." "You come in and exercise your body and refresh your mind, your spirit is uplifted. The people are so friendly you walk out dancing."

The Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum is the largest Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history, and is focused on rebuilding Jewish life throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

The agreement encompasses a broad range of initiatives from tourism and agriculture to the transfer of land that will facilitate the building of a new airport.

The region of Eilat/Eilot is Toronto's twinned community through the Partnership 2000 initiative.

Hillel students enjoy spirit of General Assembly

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Jewish peoplehood. Religious pluralism. Israel advocacy. Last week, over 300 university students from across North America gathered in Toronto to discuss these, and other, issues. Of course there was also a band, socializing, and plenty of ruach (spirit).

The Hillel Shabbaton, with the theme "One People, Many Voices: Shaping Our Global Jewish Future," took place in the days leading up to the United Jewish Communities General Assembly (GA).

When the Shabbaton ended on Sunday morning, the students joined more than 3,500 other Jewish leaders from across North America at the GA - the world's largest annual gathering of Jewish leaders, which was hosted by UJA Federation.

Among the highlights of the Shabbaton were an address by Israeli Member of Parliament Rabbi Michael Melchior, a deputy minister in the Israel Prime Minister's office, and a performance by up and coming Israeli musician Ivri Lider. The students also participated in workshops on issues ranging from global hunger and homelessness to klezmer and Yiddish revival.

Despite such serious subject matter, the Shabbaton was primarily an opportunity for students from far-flung schools to build relationships and have fun. All 300 participants gathered for Shabbat meals that featured plenty of spirit and singing.

Seventy students from Toronto made up the largest delegation. They also played a more active role in planning the event than host-city students have in the past, with three different student committees working on everything from logistics to spirit building. Hillel of Greater Toronto, supported by UJA Federation, also hosted the Saturday night Ivri Lider concert at Danforth Music Hall.

"This was an opportunity to showcase our community at its best," said Stephanie Krasman, associate executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto. A number of Torontonians shared their expertise with the students; among them Avrum Rosensweig, director of Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Humanitarian and Relief Committee; Klezmer musician Eric Stein of "Beyond the Pale"; and Hillel executive director, Zac Kaye.

At the GA they met other leaders from their communities, many of whom were eager to hear the students' perspectives on the issues facing North American Jewry. They also took part in workshops and plenary sessions designed to foster leadership and enhance awareness.

The students, and other GA attendees, also shopped for Israeli handicrafts, books, and Judaica at the Global Jewish Marketplace; and heard addresses by luminaries such as Minister of Justice Irwin Cotler and Prime Minister Paul Martin.

The student Shabbaton represented one success story, among many at the GA, which was chaired by Peter Ekstein and Debbie Kimel. Julia Koschitzky was the GA International Chair.

Florida's Federations come through during Wilma

Community.

We throw the word around a lot, but when disaster strikes its meaning becomes clear. When Hurricane Wilma hit, the sizeable Jewish population in South Florida found that their community includes not only their neighbours and friends, but local Jewish Federations and United Jewish Communities (UJC) which represents 155 Jewish federations throughout North America as well.

"I think it was one of those times in the history of the community where there was a high degree of confluence," said Jacob Solomon, Executive Director of the Greater Miami Jewish Federation. "It affected people on a very personal level, but it also affected us as a community, as a whole."

While few people in the Jewish community were rendered homeless by the storm, even those who suffered minimal property damage were left without power and water. Relief efforts took place despite the fact that the staff and volunteers who aid the community were themselves affected by the hurricane. Volunteers from the Greater Miami Jewish Federation, for instance, went to check on housebound clients despite their personal struggles with property damage and power outages. In Palm Beach County, members of the Federation's Jewish Teen Initiative brought food, water and ice to seniors living in Century Village. The Broward Federation brought meals to elderly residents, and will be hosting seminars to counsel people on their entitlements from insurance companies and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).

"They did a rather extraordinary job getting professionals and volunteers mobilized to go into areas impacted to determine how they could be helpful," said Barry Swartz, Senior Vice President of UJC.

Help is also coming from the UJC itself, which began to assess the damage immediately following the storm. Some Jewish Federation facilities and synagogues in Broward, South Palm Beach County and Miami suffered storm damage.

UJC's Howard Feinberg, who staffs the UJC Emergency Committee with Swartz, will be traveling to Florida shortly to help the individual communities determine what they need in terms of assistance.

"UJC has been amazing," said Solomon. "It is the epitome of professionalism and the embodiment of chesed."

To Solomon, the response to the storm illustrates the Federation system's "core values of collective responsibility and mutual existence...it's what our system is about at its very finest."

Yitzhak Rabin remembered

Tears flowed as the Hillel choir sang "Shir LaShalom" (Song of Peace) at the recent community memorial marking the 10th anniversary of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

More than 300 people, representing a cross-spectrum of the community, attended the event at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). It was a joint program of UJA Federation and the Israeli Consulate.

"Today we mourn that an elected Jewish Prime Minister was assassinated by another Jewish person," said Israel's Consul General, Ya'acov Brosh.

Ken Dryden, Canada's Minister of Social Development, offered words of remembrance to Rabin "as a pioneer."

"He was that rare, almost unique, combination: an idealist and a realist," said Dryden.

The ceremony also included the lighting of a memorial candle, the recitation of "El Maleh Rachamim," and a film on Rabin's life. A poignant moment came when Yisrael David and Yitzhak Argaman sang "HaReut" (The Friendship), one of Rabin's favourite songs.

Youth movements representing all facets of Zionist thought participated in the memorial. Among those giving readings were representatives of Tzofim, Bnei Akiva, BBYO, Habonim Dror, Canadian Young Judaea, Hashomer Hatzair, Beitar-Tagar, and USY.

Dani Fine of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education called the ceremony a "unifying event," noting that it provided an important opportunity for individuals from various political and religious perspectives to mark the anniversary.

"The bonds between the Jewish community in Toronto and Israel are deep and strong," said Gary Siepser, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President, Strategic Community Planning and Engagement. "The tragedy of the Prime Minister's assassination deeply affects us. This event gives us an opportunity to express that sense of loss."

For Brosh, though, the hardest part of the anniversary is noting that ten years later, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is being threatened by extremists. "Is this what we learned as an Israeli society?"

Rabin left an ambivalent legacy, Halevi says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yitzhak Rabin, the only Israeli prime minister to be assassinated, has left an ambivalent legacy, according to author and journalist Yossi Klein Halevi.

Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple last week on the 10th anniversary of his murder, Halevi both praised and panned the late prime minister.

Halevi said Rabin was the first Israeli leader to realize that Israel cannot keep the Palestinians of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip under permanent military occupation.

But by allowing what he described as an undemocratic, corrupt Palestinian leadership to rule the Palestinian areas after the 1993 Oslo accords, Rabin foreclosed the chances of real peace with the Palestinians.

Halevi, a senior fellow at the conservative Shalem Center in Jerusalem, said that Rabin set into motion a process of freeing Israel from the occupation.

After he won the prime ministership for the second time in 1992, Rabin declared, "Let's take Gaza out of Tel Aviv and Tel Aviv out of Gaza."

Israel's recent withdrawal from Gaza and four West Bank settlements, for demographic and strategic reasons, was the outcome of Rabin's assessment, said Halevi, who was in Toronto to deliver the first Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the season.

But in negotiating with the exiled PLO leadership from Tunis rather than with local Palestinian leaders in the territories, Rabin erred, Halevi said, because he thus permitted PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat to impose a corrupt dictatorship on the Palestinians, who yearn for democracy and transparency.

Halevi added that Oslo's "most shameful moment" occurred when Rabin, having signed the Declarations of Principles in Washington, D.C., claimed that Arafat could contain terrorism since he was not bound by conventional democratic constraints.

But a decade after Rabin's death, Israelis have learned that Israel cannot make peace with a Palestinian leadership that turns reconciliation on and off like a tap and has not yet established a workable government, Halevi said.

Israelis hoped that the Palestinian Authority would set a precedent by creating a democratic state in the Arab world. "But now we believe [the Palestinians] may be one of the last Arab democracies to emerge."

Chiding the Palestinian Authority for a series of failures, Halevi said it has not told its people that Israel is a legitimate state and that reconciliation is possible.

In the meantime, Israel has three responsibilities to fulfill, Halevi said.

Israel must enhance its own democracy by integrating Israeli Arabs, whom he referred to as second-class citizens. "We need to be a better democracy." He credited Rabin with being the first prime minister to call attention to that festering problem.

Israel must also carry out more unilateral pullouts from the West Bank to end the occupation. He suggested that this is Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's long-term goal.

Until recently, Israel was under the misconception that it could maintain a benign occupation. "We fooled ourselves."

Once Israel makes further withdrawals, the Palestinians will no longer be able to blame Israel for their deficiencies. But Halevi had a word of caution about unilateral withdrawals: to Arabs, they imply Israeli weakness.

In this connection, Israel has a responsibility to remain strong and prove to jihadists that democracies are stronger than dictatorships.

Turning to Iran, whose president recently called for Israel's destruction, Halevi predicted that Israel may well be forced by default to use military means to destroy Iran's budding nuclear program.

The United States is bogged down in a counter-insurgency war in Iraq and does not have the stomach for new foreign adventures, he observed.

Rabin actively prepared Israel for such a contingency by purchasing long-range bombers that can reach Iran.

Rabin's assassination was a blow to Israeli democracy and exposed the fragility of its unity, said Halevi, author of At the Entrance to the Garden of Eden.

"It will take generations [for Israelis] to absorb and overcome that act."

Meanwhile, Israeli society is torn by a profound sense of mistrust between right-wing and left-wing camps.

In his judgment, Rabin was the first Israeli prime minister to warn that democracy cannot be taken for granted.

Rabin represented the very best of his generation, having been present at every heroic moment of Israel's history, Halevi noted. "When we mourn Rabin, we mourn a man and the loss of our innocence."

Most Jewish settlers in the territories oppose violence and would be horrified by another high-profile assassination like Rabin's, said Halevi. But there are several hundred potential assassins in Israel today, many living in the territories, he added, and that's why Sharon is surrounded by a phalanx of guards.

Halevi said that Israel would be shaken deeply should one of its current leaders be killed.

He heaped praise on religious Zionist youths in Israel, calling them genuine patriots. But he cautioned that their commitment to democratic principles is thin.

Germany's Jewish community is growing, academic says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sixty years after the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps, the Jewish community in reunified Germany is enjoying a renaissance of growth, says an American academic.

In a recent Holocaust Education Week lecture at the Goethe Institut, Jeffrey Peck said that he's hopeful about the community's future.

Peck, the author of a soon-to-be-published book Being Jewish in the New Germany (Rutgers University Press), described it as the fastest growing one in Europe, with a population of 110,00, compared to some 30,000 about 20 years ago.

A professor of communications, culture and technology at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., he explained that the community has been transformed by the mass arrival of Jews from the former Soviet Union, who now comprise 85 per cent of its registered members.

In some smaller centres, they make up 100 per cent of the Jewish community, Peck said.

Culturally rich, the community has become very much a part of the German landscape, he observed, yet most Germans have never had any personal contact with Jews.

In fact, given Germany's Nazi past, Jews and Germans have an ambivalent relationship, noted Peck, a former York University professor.

Anti-Semitism exists and major Jewish institutions are guarded by police, but Jews are secure in Germany. "I'm more concerned about anti-Semitism in France than in Germany," he said.

Holocaust Education Week

What bothers him is the "subtle" brand of anti-Semitism found in Germany today. He cited the case of a well-known writer, Martin Walser, who once accused Jews of using the Holocaust to browbeat Germans.

Peck, who read excerpts from his book, said that many of the Russian Jews in Germany are not halachically observant. They also don't identify with the community, which tends to be Conservative and Orthodox in religious orientation.

Although the majority of Russian Jews are irreligious, they all want Jewish burials, he said, citing a survey.

Anti-Semitism exists but Jews are secure: Peck

In a reference to the popularity of Jewish culture in Germany, Peck noted that klezmer music has a considerable following among Germans.

But he also pointed out that cynics claim their attachment to it is therapeutic, because it makes them feel good about being German.

Peck said major German universities offer courses in Jewish studies, but most of the students in them are non-Jews.

Officer draws hard lessons from Rwandan genocide

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ten years after the genocide in Rwanda, world leaders gathered in Kigali to commemorate the country's 800,000 victims.

At the same time in 2004, some 2,000 miles to the north, 30,000 black Africans in Darfur had already been murdered and 700,000 more were living in refugee camps. One year later, the totals grew to 400,000 killed and two million made homeless.

Holocaust Education Week

In delivering the grim statistics of death and displacement, Maj. Brent Beardsley, a staff officer at the Royal Military College, noted that the world community has allowed the slaughter to occur, even after intoning the solemn words "never again" in the aftermath of the Holocaust.

Beardsley, who served as Gen. Romeo Dallaire's personal staff officer in Rwanda, said no country could muster the political will to intervene in Rwanda since no state perceived its national interests affected there.

Governments lacked the political will to act and in countries like Canada, the citizens "were never engaged by Rwanda." As a result, there was no political pressure to respond.

Beardsley's address on the lessons of the Rwandan genocide were part of Holocaust Education Week and were delivered at Tyndale University College & Seminary, a Protestant school in north Toronto.

Rwanda, he noted, is "the most Christian nation in Africa" with a majority Roman Catholic population but also many Protestant denominations. The killings in Rwanda were committed by Christians attacking other Christians. "Christian churches, at best, stood by and did nothing." At worst, members of the churches actively participated in the murders.

Neighbours turned on neighbours, friends killed friends, and some clergy arranged the murder of their own parishioners. In Rwanda, "the institutional churches were mute" and exercised little if any restraining influence on the killers, who were primarily Hutus killing Tutsis, he said.

Beardsley, who co-authored Dallaire's memoir, Shake Hands with the Devil: The Failure of Humanity in Rwanda, pointed out the international community responded to the Holocaust with a flurry of initiatives designed to prevent and confront future genocides. Among them were the Nuremburg principles and trials, the Genocide Convention and the UN Human Rights Convention.

Beardsley suggested a comprehensive plan he believes could prevent, stop or punish genocide.

He said political will is a prerequisite for any intervention and the costs of non-intervention can be high. The killings in Rwanda spilled over to neighbouring Congo and in 10 years, four million have been killed. Failed states destabilize their neighbourhood and spawn terrorism that must eventually be confronted. "It is never cheaper or easier to deal with a problem than right now," he said.

Opponents of genocide must press for action and work with the media to make intervention politically palatable. In addition, the military must be upgraded to become a force that can confront or prevent ongoing genocide. When it intervenes, it must be properly prepared and supported, he said.

Military intervention on its own is never sufficient, he continued. It must be part of a comprehensive approach that includes a mandate from a respected international body like the UN, and involves also humanitarian aid, political security and a human rights component.

Those who commit their military to such situations must "be prepared for fighting and dying" and any interventions must be conducted quickly.

He said Canada's single "greatest contribution to the world in the last half century" was the "responsibility to protect" doctrine that permits the use of force to intervene in a sovereign country to prevent genocide.

Turning to the role of Christians and churches in Rwanda, Beardsley said from the 19th century, Christians favoured the Tutsis over the Hutus and helped create the divisions that later let to murder. The church did not address discrimination, race laws and massacres that preceded the 1994 genocide. During the genocide, some church leaders "preached hate from the pulpit," even against their own parishioners.

The institution of the church must face its shortcomings in Rwanda, confess its sins, repent and make it right, he added.

When confronted with a situation like Rwanda, Christians must ask, "What would Jesus do?" Beardsley concluded.

Survivor longed for 'a boring evening at home'

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

As Gerda Weissman Klein languished in a slave labour camp, cold, lonely and hungry, she found the will to live by reflecting on the freedom and love she once felt in sharing a simple, boring evening at home with her family.

Holocaust Education Week

That image – of her father smoking a pipe and reading the newspaper, her mother crafting embroidery and she and her brother doing homework – evoked warm feelings in a place and time that seemed to know only despair.

"To have been a part of a boring evening at home became the driving force of my own survival," Weissman Klein told a capacity crowd at Adath Israel Congregation last week.

Her eloquent talk, titled, "A Boring Evening at Home," named after a book she authored of the same name, was part of the closing program for Holocaust Education Week that coincided with the commemoration of Kristallnacht, "night of broken glass," the nationwide German pogrom of Nov. 9, 1938.

In addition to speakers, the program included musical performances by Adath Israel's cantor, A. Eliezer Kirshblum, and the Adath Israel Professional Choir, as well as the lighting of a series of remembrance candles honouring survivors, their children, Holocaust victims, partisans, allied forces and Jewish war veterans.

Weissman Klein, now 81, recounted some of her wartime experiences, which she has recalled in numerous books and which were also made into a 1995 documentary called One Survivor Remembers, which garnered an Emmy Award and an Oscar.

Just 15 when the war broke out, Weissman Klein came from a middle class family in the town of Beilsko, Poland.

Her brother was the first family member to be taken away by the Nazis, and after being forced into ghetto quarters with her parents, the teenager was separated from them in 1942.

She never saw her parents again.

Weissman Klein spent the next three years in a succession of slave labour camps, where she developed a deep friendship with a childhood chum named Ilse, whom she described as a "paragon of virtue".

"There was a time in the camp when Ilse found a raspberry in the gutter, which she kept and gave to me," Weissman Klein recalled.

"[Imagine that] your entire possession in the world is a slightly bruised, dust-covered raspberry."

Ilse became like family to Weissman Klein, and their relationship served as a reminder to the teen that there was still goodness in the world.

"The love of friendship, sharing and caring that went on in the camp gave me hope for the ultimate goodness of humanity," Weissman Klein said.

As the war neared its end, the Nazis ordered the slave labourers on a death march towards Berlin.

"We started with 4,000 girls and we covered about 350 miles on foot," Weissman Klein said.

"Fewer than 120 were left at liberation."

Ilse was one of those who perished – she died in Weissman Klein's arms.

"In the last bitter hours of her life, she told me she was angry at no one and hoped no one was angry at her," Weissman Klein recalled.

"She asked me to go on for one week, and a week to the day, we were liberated by American forces."

Among the American forces was Kurt Klein, a Jewish lieutenant.

The first sight Klein had of Gerda was of a 68-pound, grey-haired, ashen-faced teen who had not had a bath in three years.

"I told him I was Jewish and he said, 'So am I,'" Weissman Klein related.

"He asked if he could see the other ladies and I told him most girls inside were too ill to walk. He held the door open for me, letting me precede him. At that moment, he restored me to humanity."

They married shortly thereafter and moved to the United States, where Weissman Klein has become a renowned author and public speaker.

In 1998, they founded the Gerda and Kurt Klein Foundation, a non-profit foundation that promotes tolerance and respect for others and encourages community service focused on ending hunger.

Weissman Klein has also written a short tribute to Ilse that is featured prominently at the New England Holocaust Memorial in Boston.

"There is an awe, a gratitude, a pain and a joy when I go to Boston," she said.

"[I go there] to not forget and to understand the greatness of living in freedom."

Meals on Wheels delivers 53,000 meals this year

By TERRY SCHONBERGER
Special to The CJN

Toronto Kosher Meals on Wheels is nearing its 40-year anniversary.

Since 1966, volunteer drivers have been delivering kosher food to those who find it difficult to shop and cook. Kosher Meals on Wheels (KMW) is the only community-based kosher meal service in the Greater Toronto Area.

Anita Ekstein, 70, has been a volunteer driver with KMW and served on its advisory committee for more than 30 years. She says there are many people who are restricted to their own homes and as a volunteer, you become a lifeline.

"When you deliver a meal, sometimes you're the only person that person sees. You're not just delivering a meal – they are so happy to see you."

Recently, KMW has been working on improving the quality and variety of food options.

"We became a lot more creative in the menu this year," says Arnold Foss, manager of corporate communications for KMW's parent organization Circle of Care.

This year, KMW started offering foods prepared in the Sephardi tradition – chicken with olives and lemon, Moroccan fish with couscous, and meatballs with celery and green peas.

Harry Drexler and his wife have been receiving meals through the program for nearly a year and he says the food is excellent.

"The stuff is so good, I would take it every day, but I'm down in the Annex. I get it three days a week plus a snack," Drexler, 72, says. "The frozen trays, which are actually excellent, we can stick in the freezer, and as we need it, we take it out and heat it."

There are several menu options available. A full meal costs $6.99, a package of six soups is $5.67, a frozen entrée costs $5.15 and snacks are $2.89. Subsidies are available to help cover food costs.

"It is remarkably inexpensive and for seniors that's quite a factor," Drexler says.

KMW is operated day to day by three staff members who co-ordinate meal distribution from the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and L'echaim Food Products and Caterers.

Two hundred and twenty-five volunteers made daily and weekly house calls to 420 service users in Toronto and southern York region this year. KMW will have delivered about 53,000 meals by the end of 2005.

The program is partly funded by the city of Toronto – which allocated $80,000 in 2005 – and through private donations. The provincial government gave $300,000 to support Circle of Care programs this year.

Foss stressed how important volunteers are to KMW. "If we didn't have the volunteers to deliver, the cost of a meal would be very high," he says.

Volunteer drivers are reimbursed for the cost of gas, but many of them donate the money back to KMW. Some individuals who benefited from the food program are now volunteers.

KMW is looking for volunteers to help deliver meals in the mornings. For information, call Gail Zack at 416-373-4099.

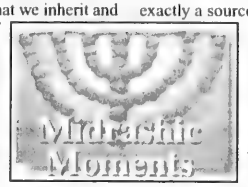
A blessing for future generations

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Every year, we read of our ancestors, the remarkable individuals who formed a covenant with God that we inherit and pass forward. Most of what we notice deals with the tremendous innovations that each generation brings to the religion.



With Abraham and Sarah, clearly the most foundational concept is the recognition of a singular God who exists in a non-physical form. Even more monumental is the ability to have a personal relationship with that God that will enrich them, their descendants and the entire world.

Yet, sometimes we are so caught up in the larger picture that we can lose sight of the beautiful subtleties in the communication that occurs between God and these first generations. When God blesses Abraham and Sarah and declares that future generations will be blessed, the midrash introduces a wonderful dilemma. What is the best blessing that can be given to anyone? It is not merely to have children, for there are several times in the Bible when children are not exactly a source of pride and joy.

According to the midrash, which in this case speaks in analogy, the matter can be understood by learning of the man who set out on a journey in the wilderness. After travelling for a few days, or maybe 10, he notices a tree in the distance and decides there must be water beneath it. After reaching the tree, he does indeed find a spring at its base and he notices how beautiful the tree is and how wonderful its fruit is growing. The traveller sits in the shade of the tree, eats its fruit, drinks from the spring and feels his spirit rejuvenate.

When it's time to leave, the traveller turns to the tree and asks how he can bless the tree in recognition of all it has given him. He cannot bless the tree with beauty, since it is already beautiful. Likewise, he cannot bless it with strength, since its wood is already strong. It does not need anything, since it already has water and is growing wonderfully. The traveller then says: "I bless you that all your seedlings grow to be as you are."

According to the midrash, this is the blessing of covenant. It is not simply the blessing of bearing children, but of rearing children. God blesses our ancestry that we, like they, should cultivate within us the strength and beauty of this tree. Just as it stood ready to help a passerby, just as Abraham and Sarah opened their tent to anyone in need, we, their descendants, should grow to continue with these values and walk in their footsteps.

Jewish continuity is not information that sits in a book. Continuity is an education that is passed to each generation of children, blessing them to grow and cultivate Jewish values. When they express these values in the subtle daily choices that we all make, then the traveller will forever find the life-saving tree.

Emigration leads to totally new life for Falash Mora

By VICTOR YAGODA

Guest Voice

Most of the Falash Mora who have registered for aliyah have gathered around compounds in the cities of Gondar and Addis Ababa. They came from villages in distant rural areas and now live with their entire families in temporary housing in tukols (thatched huts) and in shantytowns. Those who are in the last stages before embarking for Israel live in temporary compounds provided by the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) and the Jewish Agency For Israel (JAFI).

Representatives of JAFI and the Israeli Ministry of Interior (MOI) interview Falash Mora who have relatives in Israel and who have officially approached the MOI to allow family reunification.

The larger compound is in the city of Gondar and serves more than 10,000 people. One of the most amazing sights is the school, where approximately 2,500 children from grades 1 to 7 learn to read and write Amharic and Hebrew. Lessons are given in 27 different classrooms, three shifts per day, so that every child can learn. These children receive meals at school every day.

Lessons on religion and tradition for male and female adults are also provided in the Gondar compound, and a synagogue has been established. During my visit, shortly before Rosh Hashanah, the shofar was blown daily. It was awe-inspiring to see hundreds of adults of all ages, wrapped in blue and white tallitot and donning tfillin in the middle of the compound, in rural Ethiopia.

There is also an impressive food distribution station at the Gondar compound, which provides children up to six years old with balanced meals twice daily. Pregnant and nursing women also receive special food allocations. In addition, families are given bags of beans and teff, a tiny, round grain that flourishes in the highlands of Ethiopia, which is used to make injera, the traditional Ethiopian spongy, sour flatbread.

Some Falash Mora earn their livelihood at the Gondar compound in a weaving workshop, where they make gabbi, the traditional Ethiopian costume made of woven cotton, and small tallitot. Others are employed in a blacksmith workshop, performing the traditional Jewish trade of the region. This enterprise provides a modest income for the many that work there.

Given the grim reality all around it, the compound is an outstanding microcosm that includes school, religious-traditional lessons for adults, food distribution and employment workshops.

Medical care is also provided. The JDC operates a clinic with laboratories and diagnostic facilities in Gondar (there is also one in Addis Ababa). The clinical team treats pregnant women and babies, and provides vaccinations and other medical treatment. People come from afar to be treated at the JDC clinics, which are considered to be very well equipped and, although non-sectarian, serve most of the Falash Mora.

I witnessed a wonderful sight in Gondar in which a multitude of people were expecting to hear if they are eligible for aliyah. One particular family had just learned that their request had been approved, and that they would be making aliyah soon. They came out of the JAFI compound, and hundreds of family members and friends came forward to offer congratulations. There was much hugging and kissing. It was very emotional for me to see how the life of a family had immediately changed by one simple decision.

The final stage before aliyah takes place at the Israeli Embassy in Addis Ababa. A small team of Israelis and local Ethiopians, headed by JAFI emissary Ori Konforti, facilitate the emigration of the Falash Mora, who have been living in Ethiopia for thousands of years. There are interviews, medical exams, vaccinations and a final briefing about what to expect when they arrive in Israel. Preparing people for the major change between Ethiopia and Israel is not an easy task. When I was watching all this, I asked myself, "How do you prepare people, after 2,500 years in one place, for a four-hour flight into a totally new life?"

After being in Ethiopia for four days, these are the sights I will always remember.

I saw people waiting for an answer, a simple answer: yes or no. This answer is like a jury verdict, a verdict that will or will not allow them reunification with their families, and a life with a better future.

I saw people saying goodbye to those departing and then sadly walking back to their huts in tears. They will continue to wait and hope.

I saw people in new travel attire provided by JDC saying goodbye and then travelling to the airport. They leave with mixed feelings as they approach a new reality, leaving behind bothers, sisters, parents and friends.

I saw people getting on a plane for the first time in their lives. Most other passengers were just casually flying home or going on holiday. These olim are about to make a major change in their lives.

I saw people reuniting with their relatives in Israel. Easy to say, but for them it is simply a miracle.

Victor Yagoda, United Israel Appeal of Canada's deputy director general in Jerusalem, recently returned from a fact-finding trip to Ethiopia.

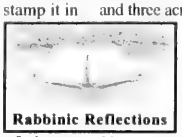
Fascinated by footprints

By RABBI DANIEL GOTTLIEB



What is it about footprints that fascinates us as human beings? What is it that makes us want to plant our footprint in the sand at the water's edge, watch as a wave comes ashore and washes it out, and then quickly go back to stamp it in place again?

I believe it is about making our mark, that deep inside we are desperate to show who we are and where we have been, and that we have, in fact, been there. Much of what we do in life involves deciding how we want to be remembered. Our footprint is the evidence that we existed in this place and time. Its size and shape are determined by how big we are. And we will be able to tell which was bigger and which was smaller, if they changed directions along the way and much more. And we will know with certainty that they were there. And that is why footprints fascinate us.

Now, if we think of a footprint as a mark of where we have been and that we have been there, it's easy to understand what environmentalists mean when they speak of our environmental footprint. This is the mark we make upon the Earth by being here; its size and shape are determined by how much of the world's space we use – how much water, electricity, food, trees, animals and such.

We who live in North America have the largest environmental footprints in the world. In the Third World, the average environmental footprint is between two and three acres. This means that a single human being there will use between two and three acres worth of natural resources in his or her lifetime. The average Canadian footprint is four times as large. The world average is six acres per person.

Human beings now use 88 per cent of the world for food, energy and living. This leaves only 12 per cent for all the other species with whom we share the planet. Or, to look at it another way, if everyone in the world lived the way the average Canadian lives, we would need five or six planet earths to sustain us all as a human race.

Judaism teaches that we have the responsibility for taking care of our world, beginning with the first commandment given by God: "Be fertile and increase, fill the earth and have dominion over it… and over the fish in the sea, the birds in the sky and all the living things that creep on earth."

We are not told simply to "increase and fill the earth," but that we have the responsibility to "have dominion," that is, "benevolent responsibility and stewardship" over the earth and its inhabitants.

"God said, 'I give you every seed-bearing plant that is upon all the earth, and every tree that has seed-bearing fruit; they shall be yours for food. And to all the animals on land, to all the birds of the sky, and to everything that creeps on Earth in which there is the breath of life, I give all the green plants for food.'"

As stewards, we must ensure the well-being of the earth and all who dwell upon it, and take the necessary measures to ensure that it will be sustained forever. Our sages put forth three principles to help direct us in this sacred task:

- People are co-workers with God in helping to preserve the world.
- Everything belongs to God. We are stewards of the Earth, to see that its produce is available for all God's children.
- We are not to waste or unnecessarily destroy anything of value.

Together, these three principles articulate our responsibility. They call us to make our footprint smaller, so that the imprint of our lives on the earth will not be one of destruction.

So here are some small steps that we can take: use less water, make better decisions about food, use less energy, try to be less wasteful, be more efficient in choosing modes of transportation, set a day aside each week to use less of everything – we call this day Shabbat.

Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb is spiritual leader of Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill, Ont., and president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

The readers recommend

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, once again, I turn the tables and let readers tell me about their favourite Jewish websites.

Before Yom Kippur, I wrote an article about tshuvah (often translated as repentance) and mentioned the important role that tzedakah plays.

Arnie Draiman wrote from Israel to tell me about the Ziv Tzedakah Fund and its "mitzvah heroes, tzedakah educational tools and great people and projects." The Ziv Tzedakah Fund is a wonderful – and inspiring – project. It is basically a clearing house raising money for wonderful projects, large and small, that have come to its attention. Like Rabbanit Kapach, the "wedding dress lady" of Jerusalem who provides gowns to brides who are too poor to buy their own. Or John Beltzer, founder of Songs of Love, who along with songwriters and musicians record personalized songs for children who are critically ill. Or the many bnei and bnot mitzvah who decided to use their celebrations to raise funds for worthy projects. [www.ziv.org]

The popularity of blogs continues to soar. During the disengagement from Gaza, Prof. Sally Zerker of York University wrote to tell me about hers. In Myths, Issues, Facts, she shares her thoughts about such issues as the world's double standard directed against Israel as well as critiques of Tony Blair and the left. I was particularly interested by her piece The Cross and the Jews, in which she talks about her reflexive aversion to the cross as a child. She then looks at the impact of the cross, starting with its emergence as a Christian symbol in the fourth century to its placing at Auschwitz by Carmelite nuns and to its use as a modern fashion statement. [http://professorsfz.blogspot.com]

The Jewish Connection is the joint effort of a dozen Jewish bloggers including, Pearl, who wrote to tell me about it. On the day I peeked in the offerings were quite varied. I read an article on whether to take Jewish kids out as "Erev Halloween" was approaching. Pearl wrote about her evolving feelings about being able to dance with the Torah on Simchat Torah. And a contributor named Z told of how Simon Wiesenthal's determination to lead a life fighting on behalf of millions of Jewish souls had changed his own life. [http://ajewishsoul.blogspot.com/]

Last year, I did a piece about one-of-a-kind Jewish music and mentioned the thriving Bukharian Jewish music scene. Laurel Snyder came across my article while researching Bukharian music and sent me the link to her wonderful podcast on the subject. I learned that "for more than 2,000 years, the Jews of Central Asia existed independent of other communities and developed their own traditions. Their music draws on literary sources from Persian poetry to the Zohar." [http://tinyurl.com/8v59k] I'm also glad that Snyder wrote because she also introduced me to nextbook.org, "a gateway to Jewish literature, culture and ideas."

Paul Segal wrote to tell me about an interesting – and often provocative – comic strip called ShaBot 6000, created by Ben Baruch. Each strip features ShaBot, a 1950s vintage robot (bedecked with a kippah) and his human owner (beard, payes, black coat.) Together, they try "to find logic in a religion that sometimes DOES NOT COMPUTE."

ShaBot: Wow, your pecs are looking huge! Been working out?

Owner: I BENSCH after every meal!

Each strip has a glossary to explain the joke or bad Jewish pun. ("Bensching is the recitation of Birkat Hamazon, the grace after meals. How much can you bensch?") But before you click away, be warned that ShaBot can have quite an attitude and not everyone will share this robot's sense of humour. [http://shabot6000.com/]

I did get a chuckle, though, from the animated cartoon in which ShaBot gets quite worked up when he confuses the shofar sound "tekiah" with the name of a similar sounding alcoholic beverage from Mexico. [http://shabot6000.com/tekiah]

Paper Clips

Changing the world...
One classroom at a time.

Something amazing happened in the town of Whitwell, TN; a town where the population peaks at about 2,000 people and where the word "skyline" is epitomized in breathtaking views of the rustic Smoky Mountains.

The citizens of this rural Tennessee community are almost exclusively white and Christian; the town was not accustomed to cultural diversity. But in 1998 that all changed with a classroom project at Whitwell Middle School. The "Paper Clips" project sparked one of the most inspirational and profound lessons in tolerance, in one of the most least likely places.

Bnot Sherut Leumi accomplishments marked

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

About 70 Israeli women who volunteer in the Sherut Leumi program recently gathered in Toronto for a convention that gave them the opportunity to participate in seminars, learn from each other and celebrate their accomplishments.

Sherut Leumi, which literally means national service, is a non-military civil service that was established in 1971 to offer 18- to 20-year-old religious women in Israel the chance to serve their country in a different way.

"Instead of serving in the army, they opt to serve two years of public service," said Jerry Tepperman, the executive director of Mizrachi Canada, a Zionist organization.

"Many of them serve in Israel in humanitarian jobs such as teaching Hebrew to olim and helping people in need."

Others, he added, are invited to visit Jewish communities in North America and the world to act as ambassadors to Israel.

"These women are here to promote Israel to the community, to promote love of Israel and to promote aliyah, but in a non-imposing, passive sort of way," Tepperman said.

The women received training in Israel through lectures and workshops and were taught how to cope with challenges they might face while serving their country abroad.

The weekend-long convention, from Nov. 3 to 6, organized by the Jewish Agency, with financial help from Mizrachi Canada, was meant to put what they were trained to do in Israel into practice, as well as celebrate the good work they do.

A gala titled Melaveh Malka, which took place at the Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto was attended by about 70 Bnot Sherut Leumi. Some 40 others joined the women in celebration.

In between eating and dancing, Rabbi Yehuda Felix, the head of the formal education department of the Jewish Agency, and Kurt Rothschild, the chair of the World Mizrachi Movement, each addressed the gathering with words of gratitude and praise.

"There was lots of dancing, good food and a good time was had by all," Tepperman said.

"This event acknowledged the self-sacrifice of the young women who came to the Jewish communities… to work hard for a just cause."

Tepperman said they often work eight to 10 hours a day and are always willing to help in any way they can.

"This program is one of the things that Israel is doing to address the Diaspora."

'It is amazing to see communities exchange views'

"The GA gives us an opportunity to exchange views about the challenges the Jewish people and the State of Israel are facing. It is important to keep talking about our links with Israel and about how important Israel is with regards to Jewish identity."

Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, said he was proud to be "part of such a vibrant community" in Canada, and he noted that the assembly was meeting at a bittersweet time for Israel.

"It is especially poignant that we meet on the anniversary of the death of Yitzhak Rabin. It is important that we learn from him to keep our feet on the ground while pushing for an agenda of peace."

Delegate Paul Marcus, president and CEO of the York University Foundation, York's fundraising arm, said that despite being "a fast-paced convention," the GA "gives us the chance to pause and reflect on so many vital things such as the challenges that face world Jewry. It is also an opportunity to showcase our accomplishments."

General Assembly in Toronto

Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth, said the conference helps solidify a sense of klal Yisrael.

"Jews often feel isolated in their communities and have to operate alone," he said. "The GA has every organization under one roof and it's a great opportunity to feel united and strong."

For Dina Gidron, director of the Israel Aliyah Centre, it was a thrill to be able to attend.

"This is the most important Jewish event in North America, and I feel lucky that it took place while I am in Toronto," she said.

"It is amazing to see communities interact and exchange views. It is important for us to have an open line of communication."

Keith Landy, a transplanted South African and past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, played the part of the proud Torontonian.

"Jewish leadership has gathered in one of the most dynamic communities to talk about important issues. While here, I have heard people singing the praises of Toronto and Canada, and it's like a breath of fresh air to hear it."

More pullouts to come, Ha'aretz analyst believes

By LAUREN S. BRESLIN and WILF GEROFSKY
Special to the CJN

"Ariel Sharon has denied there will be a second disengagement – but I don't believe him," Aluf Benn, diplomatic editor for the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz, said last week at the University of Toronto.

"If we want Israel to remain a Jewish and democratic state, we have to choose, and the choice is to consolidate the Jewish majority in a smaller territory," Benn told a a handful of students at a sparsely attended Nov. 7 public lecture co-sponsored by Hillel titled, "Life After Gaza: Assessing the Road to Peace."

Benn, who was in Canada on a speaking tour sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee, argued that securing a Jewish majority within Israel is vital to the country's survival.

"Israel needs to take care of its strategic interest – and the paramount interest these days is demography," he said.

Benn, a former Ha'aretz news editor and defence correspondent, said three major developments at the end of 2004 ushered in new hope for progress toward Mideast peace.

First was the death of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, who led the Palestinian movement for some 40 years. The second development came when, after much debate, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza pullout plan was approved by the Israeli cabinet and Knesset. The third was the re-election of U.S. President George W. Bush, which meant a continued American commitment to regional change.

"The main expectation due to the combination of these three developments was that this will lead to some form of resumption of dialogue and negotiations," Benn said.

He criticized the Palestinian Authority under Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas on that score.

"As much as [Abbas] was able to attract international support for himself, I think he's done very little to manage the Palestinian Authority."

More specifically, Benn said that although Abbas has been willing to discuss issues of common interest, such as the Rafah border crossing, he has failed to deliver on Israel's most fundamental demand: an end to terrorism.

"So far it's not the new dawn on the other side that we were expecting," Benn said.

The Gaza disengagement, on the other hand, was swift, well-orchestrated, and carried out on schedule and with minimal damage, he said.

"Most people wanted to get disengagement over with, and about a few weeks after, the issue more or less disappeared from the public view."

Benn spoke about the impact of Bush's Middle East policy the next day at Hamilton's Adas Israel Synagogue in a talk co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Hamilton.

He argued Israelis are skeptical about changes in America's Mideast policy in favour of democratization and regime change, fearing from past experience with Iran that the demise of regional dictators can compromise their security.

That's because Israelis see the possibility of radical Islamic states on their doorstep. "We fear that, given the choice, our neighbours would elect the likes of Hamas and Hezbollah. Would that be a positive development? I'm not sure."

Many Israelis, he said, wonder if Egypt and Jordan would still respect their peace treaties with Israel if they became true democracies, "or would the people, who hate us, tear them up?"

Benn cited the 1979 downfall of the Shah of Iran as an event with long-term negative implications, calling it "the worst development from our national security perspective."

The United States had been propping up the Shah, who despite human rights excesses was seen as a pillar of regional stability. But when Jimmy Carter became U.S. president, he criticized the Shah's human rights record and eventually withdrew support for his regime.

This led to the Shah's ouster and the establishment of a radical Islamic regime – and, ultimately, the recent threat by Iran's president to "wipe Israel off the map," backed up by Iran's drive to develop nuclear weapons, Benn said.

He noted that current U.S. President George W. Bush has adopted the doctrine at the heart of the recent book by Israeli MK Natan Sharansky, in which the former Soviet dissident argues that setting up democratic regimes in the Mideast is the key to regional security and stability.

Sharansky argues that all people, even those who have always lived under totalitarian regimes, yearn for freedom and democracy, and he says democracies are more likely than other societies to live beside each other in peace.

Bush's adoption of "the Sharansky doctrine" marks a fundamental change in U.S. foreign policy, Benn said, since for the previous five or six decades, the paramount goal of American policy in the Middle East had been stability.

Backing dictators may not have passed the Sharansky test, but "at least [the Americans] knew who they were dealing with," Benn said.

Benn said most Israelis initially regarded Bush's promotion of democracy as naiveté on the part of American right-wingers who had no idea about harsh Mideast realities.

Yet, he said, unprecedented events such as demonstrations against Syrian occupation of Lebanon after the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri and the subsequent withdrawal of Syrian troops have heralded a sea change in the region.

"We see Syria threatened with Security Council sanctions. We see change in Lebanon. We see Iran with its nuclear program discussed at the International Atomic Energy Agency. We see oil prices skyrocketing. We see Iraq burning in flames. And with all these developments, Israel is not mentioned once," Benn said.

Indeed, he said, the world now realizes that the Israeli-Palestinian issue, though its Israel's most pressing foreign policy and national security problem, is not the region's key issue. "There are other problems – the growth of population, the underdevelopment of the economies and societies, and Bush is the first world leader to tackle these problems and call for change."

Despite that, Israelis are wary.

"We see fundamental change, but we're still afraid of the consequences," he said. "We don't know where this will lead us. Bush is not in his best shape politically. The American army is not doing very well in Iraq. [And with] natural disasters [and] political scandals in Washington, [we] don't know if they would have the stamina to follow this process forward."

Holocaust Education Week held at McMaster

Non-Jewish victims acknowledged during programs

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Although McMaster University has taken part in creating programs for Holocaust Education Week for the past seven years, the three co-chairs of the program wanted to make a few changes this year.

"We wanted to see a change in the programs and get more clubs involved," said Andrea Rowan, a co-chair for the Holocaust Education Week 2005.

McMaster second-year students Rowan, Matthew Stein and Michelle Rodak felt that focusing on other groups victimized in the Holocaust would help people join together in the fight against intolerance.

The three organizers, who are also executives on the Jewish Students Association (JSA), planned the week-long program, which ran from Nov. 7 to 11, to feature tables that focused on the historical background and personal stories of gay men during the Holocaust as well as other minority groups including the Roma, the physically disabled and Christian righteous gentiles.

Having worked on organizing the program as a group since the start of the school year, Stein is hopeful that the hard work and long hours will translate into a greater awareness of the horrors suffered by more than 11 million people, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

Stein said he was pleased that the JSA received a lot of help and support from other student groups on campus.

"The key to this event is that the JSA was not alone."

Stein said the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgendered Centre, the Catholic Student Association, the Polish Student Association, the Christians for Israel, the Anti-Violence Network and the Zionists at McMaster all had a hand in organizing this event.

"Each club put in a lot of work and their efforts have been greatly appreciated," he said.

Rodak, who was mostly responsible for putting together a table that featured Christian groups, said she is proud that hundreds of people passed by the three tables and learned something.

"The tables were devoted to righteous gentiles and the persecuted Polish people. Christians are usually given such a horrible name in the history of the Holocaust, but not all Christians were silent. People did stand up," Rodak said.

But in Rowan's opinion, the highlight of the program was the lecture given by Joanne Cohen, a scholar, author, human rights advocate, and the daughter of a Holocaust survivor.

"She spoke about lessons of diversity and democracy and how we can learn from the Holocaust, how education about the Holocaust… can erase ignorance," Rowan said.

Along with film screenings and lectures by members of the community who were victims of the Holocaust themselves, or may have ties to survivors, "Commemoration: Kristallnacht" was another event that was put together with the entire community in mind.

The commemoration featured an educational slide show, a candlelighting ceremony and a performance by a choir, as well as testimony from a Holocaust survivor.

Although the programming of this year's Holocaust Education Week was different in that the focus was split between the millions of Jews who were victimized, as well as groups that aren't talked about as often, Rowan said she was excited about the response she got.

"Everyone was really supportive of our decisions."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Time for some fall cooking

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Fall is here! The signs are everywhere. Crisp, cool weather brightens our days, and in most areas, Mother Nature is putting on a spectacular show of brilliant reds and golds. Even in Israel, where we jokingly say fall lasts about five minutes, you can feel a difference in the air in the early morning and evening.

It's the time of year to get back in the mood for more substantial foods than the light summer meals, yet we're not quite ready for the stews and comfort foods of winter. People who otherwise hate to cook don't seem to mind spending some time in the kitchen preparing meals.

The grocery stores and produce markets display a variety of fruits and vegetables that almost rival Mother Nature – red, green and yellow apples, green, orange and gold squash, and a plethora of vegetables that are almost as brilliant as the leaves on the trees.

Winter squashes make wonderful one-dish meals. In addition to their beauty, taste and texture, they are power-packed with fibre, potassium, calcium phosphorous and vitamin A. When purchasing, look for squash with no cracks or bruises, the heavier the better, and store them in a cool, dry place. One of the nice things about winter squashes is that they have very long shelf lives. Acorn and spaghetti squash have the shortest shelf life (about two months), but the other hard-shelled squash can be kept for six to seven months before they begin to deteriorate.

CHUNKY SQUASH SOUP

I love to serve this hot in the fall for Shabbat dinner and during the summer chilled. It's delicious either way.

2 tbsp. olive oil
2 leeks, white part only, cut into 1-in. chunks
1 onion, cut into 1-in. chunks
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 carrots, peeled and cut into 1-in. chunks
2 lb. peeled winter squash or pumpkin, peeled, seeded and cut into 1-in. chunks
2 sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into 1-in. chunks
1 tsp. thyme
8 cups chicken or vegetable broth
1 tsp. lemon juice
salt and pepper to taste

Heat oil in large saucepan. Add leeks, onion and garlic and sauté for a few minutes until soft. Add carrots, sweet potato and squash. Add broth and thyme and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer 30 minutes, or until vegetables are tender. Season with lemon juice and salt and pepper. If soup is too thick, add additional broth. Makes 8 servings.

ROASTED BUTTERNUT SQUASH AND GARLIC LASAGNA

This is an unusual recipe based on one from an old Gourmet magazine, but it's great stuff! It requires a little time, but it's easy to make and you'll make this time and again once you've tried it. The ingredients all go together amazingly well.

3 lb. butternut squash, quartered, seeded, peeled and cut into ½-in. pieces (about 9½ cups)
4-5 large cloves garlic, minced
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
4 cups milk or pareve chicken broth
2 tbsp. dried rosemary, crumbled
½ cup butter or margarine
4 tbsp. flour
9 sheets 7 x 3½-in. dry no-boil lasagna noodles
1⅓ cups fresh grated Parmesan cheese
½ cup smoked Gouda cheese, shredded
1 cup heavy cream
½ tsp. salt
fresh rosemary sprigs for garnish

Preheat oven to 450 and oil two shallow baking pans (I use disposable aluminum pans). In a large bowl, toss squash and garlic with oil until coated well and spread in one layer in the two pans. Roast squash 10 minutes and season with salt. Stir squash and roast 10-15 minutes longer, or until tender and beginning to turn golden.

While squash is roasting, use a saucepan to bring milk or pareve chicken broth to a simmer with the rosemary.

In a large, heavy saucepan melt butter and stir in flour. Cook, stirring, for three minutes. Remove pan from heat and whisk in milk mixture in a stream until smooth.

רעדאַגירט פֿון: אַלעק סילווער

אויסגעמישער חורבן-מעמואר

פֿון אַלעק סילווער

Food, Scrumptious Food

Fall's the time for more substantial foods

Return pan to heat and simmer sauce, whisking occasionally, about 10 minutes or until thick. Stir in squash and salt and pepper to taste. (Sauce may be made three days ahead and refrigerated with its surface covered with plastic wrap.)

Reduce oven temperature to 375. Grease a 9 x 13-in. baking pan. Pour one cup sauce into baking pan (sauce will not cover bottom completely) and cover with three lasagna sheets, making sure they do not touch each other. Spread half of remaining sauce over pasta and sprinkle with half of Parmesan and Gouda cheeses. Make one more layer in the same manner, beginning and ending with pasta.

In a bowl of an electric mixer, beat cream with salt until it holds soft peaks, and it spread evenly over top pasta layer, making sure pasta is completely covered. Sprinkle remaining cheeses over cream. Cover pan tightly with foil, tenting slightly to prevent foil from touching top layer, and bake for 30 minutes. Remove foil and bake lasagna an additional 10 minutes, or until top is bubbling and golden. Let stand for 5 minutes. Garnish each serving with rosemary. Makes 6 servings.

SPAGHETTI SQUASH CASSEROLE

For those days when you're too busy to cook, this dish cooks in the microwave for a total of about half hour.

1 spaghetti squash
½ cup canned crushed tomatoes
3 tbsp. olive oil
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. salt
pepper to taste
½ cup shredded mozzarella cheese
½ cup Parmesan cheese
½ cup chopped green onions
grated Parmesan cheese for garnish

Prick the squash in several places with a knife and place on a microwave-safe dish. Cover loosely with plastic wrap and cook in the microwave for 10 minutes. Turn the squash over and cook for another 10 minutes. Let stand to cool.

Meanwhile sauté garlic in olive oil until golden, or cook in microwave. When cool enough to handle, cut squash in half and scoop out the pulp. Pulp will resemble spaghetti. Place pulp in a casserole with the crushed tomatoes, garlic, oil, salt and pepper and mix well. Cover with the cheeses and green onions. Cook until just heated through, about 5 minutes. Makes 4 servings.

Jewish vets recall fallen comrades at a Remembrance Day ceremony

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Remembrance Day came early this year for the Ottawa Jewish Community this year. The Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Ottawa post, held a special Remembrance Day ceremony outside the Soloway Jewish Community Centre on Nov. 7.

As a piper led parading veterans and their flag bearers, Laurence Wall, a CBC Radio news producer, welcomed the veterans and those who had come to honour them.

"Every Remembrance Day ceremony is important as we honour those members of the community who served with the Armed Forces and remember those who gave their lives to preserve their freedom," he said.

"But this year is particularly noteworthy for a number of reasons. First, the government has declared 2005 the year of the veteran. Second, this year marks the 60th anniversary of the end of the Second World War. And third, Jewish war veterans in Canada are finally getting their own memorial.

"It's called 'Flames of Memory.' The designer is the noted architect Daniel Libeskind. It will be built in Toronto at the corner of Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue West in Earl Bales Park," said Wall.

Ron Prehogan, chair of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, thanked the veterans for their contribution to our country and especially to Jewish Canadians.

"We, the Jewish community of Ottawa, Canada's capital, salute all the Jewish soldiers on this day. We understand and appreciate that they fought not only for our country but also for us as Jews when the Jewish people were in peril.

"We also understand that not much has changed, that there are venomous souls in this the 21st century who are bent on seeing western civilization and the Jewish people wiped off the face of the earth. We look to our Canadian Jewish soldiers as shining examples of what it takes to protect all that we hold dear," said Prehogan.

The honorary chaplain of the Ottawa post of Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas, compared the war veterans, normally peace-loving individuals, to the biblical patriarch Abraham. "Think of the first of our patriarachs, Abraham. He was a calm, peace-loving person, but he was also a warrior. He volunteered to fight on the side of the right rather than let the forces of evil take over.

"This is rooted in Jewish tradition. If something is in jeopardy that is worth saving, if someone needs saving, we don't stand idly by. These people put their lives on the line so that we could lead a tranquil life.

"We are here today to celebrate, to acknowledge, to thank and to recognize that the very least we can do is to say that the battle they fought is worthwhile and the way we can do that is to lead meaningful lives," Rabbi Bulka said.

The Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Ottawa post, comprising approximately 112 members and associate members, was established in 1991. Its mission, "l'dor va dor" (from generation to generation), is to strengthen its members' connection to young people.

Twenty-five members of the Ottawa Jewish community gave their lives during World Wars I and II.

Baker urges Canada to lead campaign against Iran

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Canada can play a lead role in an international effort to isolate and sanction Iran in the wake of its president's call for Israel's destruction, the Israeli ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, said here recently.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's statements were "bloodcurdling" and a "very shocking revelation," Baker said.

"If… a president of a state can call for the annihilation of a whole people while developing its nuclear capability, [then] this cannot go on without action," he told a State of Israel Bonds reception.

"I am calling on Canada and the states of the world to isolate Iran in the international community."

At a conference against Zionism, held in Tehran on Oct. 26, Ahmadinejad repeated a statement by Ayatollah Khomeini, the leader of Iran's Islamic revolution, that Israel "must be wiped off the map."

He also threatened Arab countries who co-operated with Israel and the United States.

Baker praised Canada for being "perhaps the first" nation among many others to condemn the comments through statements made by Prime Minister Paul Martin and Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew, and through an all-party resolution in Parliament.

Windsor federation marks 50 years

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In celebration of the 50th anniversary of the Windsor Jewish Federation and Community Centre, the Holocaust Education Committee will present an evening of music and art.

As part of the production titled "Forbidden Sounds, Forbidden Sights – A Tribute to the Human Spirit," the Windsor Symphony Orchestra Ensemble will play musical selections that were deemed "degenerate" by the Nazis in the Holocaust era.

The event, which will be held at the Capitol Theatre and Arts Centre in Windsor, Ont., on Nov. 23, features music and art by both Jews and non-Jews.

"We want to show people that it wasn't just Jewish art that was targeted by the Nazis," said Helen Arbour, the chair of the event.

She said the evening will include music by composers Felix Mendelssohn, Scott Joplin and Arnold Schoenberg and art by painters Henri Matisse, Pablo Picasso and Vincent Van Gogh.

"The choices were based on the theme of music and art that survived the Holocaust," said Arbour, who added that much of the art that was labelled as degenerate was destroyed by the Nazis during World War II.

Throughout the evening, members of the community who represent groups that Hitler would have deemed degenerate, such as the physically disabled and homosexual, will recite "inspired readings about standing up for human rights."

The selections will feature quotes from U.S. civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., poet Maya Angelou and former first lady Eleanor Roosevelt.

"We're trying to give an overview of groups that might have been destroyed if Hitler had triumphed," Arbour said.

"We want to send the message that love is the key to solutions in the world."

Prominent members of the community, including Windsor Mayor Eddie Francis, will be part of the presentation.

While the program will run in the evening for the general public, there is also going to be an afternoon performance for high school students. The Holocaust Education Committee has prepared a lesson plan for teachers who want to convey the message of peace and tolerance to their students.

Tickets are $25. For more information, call 519-973-1772. 31a

Reflecting on what might have been

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The 10th anniversary of the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin attracted substantial media attention.

On The National (CBC, Nov. 4), Adrienne Arsenault focused on what might have happened if Rabin, the "hardline general turned peacemaker," had lived.

Arsenault interviewed Palestinian Authority legislator Hanan Ashwari, who said: "[Rabin] knew that in order to have a commitment that would hold, he needed a partner who was capable of delivering, so it was in his interest to empower the Palestinians."

Referring obliquely to the Palestinian violence that began in September 2000, Arsenault said that Israelis have made Rabin, in death, "a mythic figure who could have prevented so much [of the] violence." But this was contradicted by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak, who said in an interview that Rabin was skeptical of former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat "all along the way" and would have ultimately rejected him as unreliable.

Yitzhak Rabin on the podium in Tel Aviv's Malchei Yisrael Square – since renamed Yitzhak Rabin Square – just minutes before he was assassinated. [Isranet photo]

In "The unwritten legacy of Yitzhak Rabin" (Globe and Mail, Nov. 1), Yossi Beilin argued that the principal component of Rabin's legacy was his "political activism," demonstrated in the three years of his second term (1992-95) when he signed the Oslo accords and concluded a peace treaty with King Hussein of Jordan.

Beilin is correct that Rabin – showing leadership but also expressing the majority view – wanted to make peace with Israel's neighbours.

However, Beilin is almost certainly mistaken when he writes: "Had [Rabin] remained alive, I am certain that we would have reached an agreement with the Palestinians by May 4, 1999, our target date." To reach that goal would have required Arafat to sign an end-of-conflict agreement recognizing Jewish sovereignty in parts of Jerusalem and relinquishing a Palestinian "right of return" – the crucial issues Arafat refused to yield on with Rabin's successor Barak at the Camp David-Taba talks of 2000/2001.

Many Israeli analysts credit Rabin with taking risks for peace, but they see him, like Barak, as a pragmatist who would have adjusted his sights in keeping with the facts – foremost, Arafat's actions, which ran counter to the peace process.

Beilin, however, apparently believes only in the dream aspect of Rabin's legacy. To honour that legacy, he writes, Israel "should immediately resume negotiations on the permanent status agreement with the Palestinians in the spirit of the Geneva Accords of 2003" (of which Beilin is co-author). Again, the overwhelming majority of Israelis, even those favouring major territorial compromise in exchange for genuine peace and security, believe the current Palestinian Authority leadership is as incapable of concluding a final status agreement as Arafat was in 2000-01.

This opinion is articulated by Hirsh Goodman in the Jerusalem Report (Oct. 17): "The chaos, anarchy and lack of Palestinian Authority control over events in Gaza [makes] the idea of the PA as a peace partner as elusive as the co-operation of Yasser Arafat at the height of the intifadah."

Referring to the Geneva Accords, Goodman – who has never shied away from criticizing the Israeli government – writes: "There is no responsible Palestinian leadership that could deliver a newspaper on time in the morning, much less a peace agreement that would stand the test of time. Hamas has taken over the territories. It sets the agenda and that's the way things will stand until some force arrives within Palestinian society that can turn the Palestinian Authority into a party that can both negotiate and deliver."

Correction: Last week's column incorrectly reported that Russia did not condemn Iranian President Ahmadinejad's threat to annihilate Israel. Russia did condemn his threat both on its own and as part a unanimous UN Security Council statement on Oct. 28.

TV commentator Ben Stein gives keynote address

noting he recently met Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in New York and complemented him on enjoying a stable government.

On a more serious note, Martin condemned recent anti-Semitic attacks on synagogues and schools.

"When a synagogue, a school or a cemetery is attacked in Canada, that is an attack on every single one of us. I can categorically say that the response of leaders and individuals in every community in this country has demonstrated that Canada will not condone such acts nor will we allow them to divide us."

Turning to the international scene, Martin said the United Nations had taken a momentous step in setting aside a day for Holocaust remembrance. The resolution establishing the day (Jan. 27) was advanced by Israel – the first time the UN has passed an Israeli-initiated resolution. He noted that Canada was one of 104 resolution co-sponsors.

Martin said Israel's withdrawal from Gaza sparked increased hope for a peaceful settlement, and that the election of Mahmoud Abbas to head the Palestinian Authority was also a hopeful step. Canada supports Israelis and Palestinians resolving their conflict, and Canada will also support the PA through investments to help alleviate the plight of refugees.

Martin closed by noting the 10th anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin and said former prime minister John Turner agreed to represent Canada at memorial events in Israel.

The keynote address at the opening plenary was delivered by author, humourist, economist and TV commentator Ben Stein, who invoked two themes – gratitude for residing in North America and the importance of honouring one's parents.

It is glorious to be able to celebrate Jews' achievements freely, he said, contrasting it to the situation faced under the Nazis, when 4,000 Jews – the same number who attended the plenary – were shipped to Auschwitz every day during the Holocaust.

Stein recounted how his grandfather immigrated to the United States from Russia, joined the U.S. cavalry at age 15 and was sent to the Philippines to fight insurgents. His grandfather later worked at Ford and enjoyed it, despite the fact it was run by a rabid anti-Semite, he said.

His father, Stein continued, was a champion orator and a gifted student. Despite his academic excellence, he never held a grudge for being made to wash dishes in a frat house that did not admit Jews.

His father, who went on to become chair of the presidents' council of academic advisors under U.S. presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford, never felt aggrieved. You have to look at the big picture and see the opportunity available in America instead of "whining, bitching and moaning," Stein said.

"The discrimination in America was hurtful, to be sure, but bliss, pure bliss compared to what our fellow Jews endured in Europe.

"Gratitude rules my life."

Pointing to Jewish achievements and the disproportionate number of Jewish Nobel Prize winners, Stein sounded a cautionary note. Those achievements "scare" him, because envy can cause problems.

"The world does not like that so much. The world sees Jews building castles and can't do that themselves. [What] they can do, is knock them down."

Stein said that for him to be a good Jew meant he ought to be a good son. He felt honouring his parents was important to him as they grew older. Just by listening to what they had to say during visits, he brightened their moods, he said.

He recounted how he held his dying father's hand and read psalms to comfort him. "The one thing I did right was honour my father and my mother," he said.

Delegates also heard other touching stories at the plenary. Miss Israel, Yelena Ralfe, who advanced to the final 10 at the Miss World contest, described her aliyah to Israel from Ukraine and how she felt she had the same opportunities there as any one else in Israel.

New Yorker Erik Levis described how his participation in a birthright visit to Israel instilled pride in his Jewish heritage as well as a sense of belonging to the Jewish people.

Arieh Oz, a former lieutenant-colonel in the Israel Air Force (IAF) and head pilot for El Al, told of his youth as a hidden child in wartime Holland, protected from the Nazis by a family working with the Dutch underground.

He described his family's immigration to Israel, their difficult integration and how, by 1976, he was a squadron commander in the IAF assigned to fly the the third Hercules transport plain that landed at Entebbe during Israel's daring hostage-rescue operation.

After successfully landing the craft in the dark after the Ugandans had switched off the runway lights, he was promoted from major to lieutenant-colonel, he said.

Following his military service, he joined El Al, and by 1989, he had become the airline's chief pilot. He participated in Operation Solomon in 1991, which brought thousands of Ethiopian Jews to Israel. As part of that mission, Israel converted a Boeing 747 for multi-transport use.

Planners expected to fill the aircraft with 760 passengers. Because the passengers were so slight, many more were squeezed in. Flight documents recorded 1,087 people were jammed onto the plane, but when it landed at Ben Gurion airport, a head count revealed the final number was 1,122 passengers. It turned out children were brought on board by their mothers hidden inside their flowing white robes. The mothers were afraid their children would not be allowed on the plane and they hid them until they arrived in Israel, he said.

In describing his involvement in the operations, Oz said, "I believe it is a gift of God to give back."

Viviana Bendersky described how on Feb. 14, 2002, her family in Buenos Aires received a call that their bank account had been wiped out in the financial crisis that gripped Argentina. She immediately experienced a feeling of "falling, endlessly falling."

Many Argentine families were in similar straits, and it was donations from North American communities to the Joint Distribution Committee that saved them. "Because of you, Argentine Jews had a safety net when they needed it," she said.

Delegates also heard from Alan Franco, head of the Jewish community in Greater New Orleans, and Erich Sternberg, president of the Jewish community of Baton Rouge. They described the rescue efforts undertaken thanks to $24 million in emergency aid raised by Jewish communities. Franko noted that the Jewish community received the support of a local police SWAT team, who went to addresses provided by the local federation to rescue Jews. He joked about how the SWAT team, complete with military helmets and M-16 rifle, burst into homes and told the residents they were there from the federation of New Orleans to take them to safety.

That same SWAT team rescued 25 Torahs from New Orleans, which were relocated to communities in Baton Rouge, Houston and elsewhere.

The plenary's MC was Julia Koschitzky, vice-chair of UJC's board of trustees. Koschitzky has broad community involvement, including with UJA Federation, UIA Federations Canada, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, Keren Hayesod and as co-chair of the education committee for the Jewish Agency.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is the GA host federation.

Ottawa educators receive awards at GA

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Two of Ottawa's finest Jewish educators were in Toronto this week at the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities (UJC), where they were to be presented with Grinspoon-Steinhardt Awards for Excellence in Jewish Education.

Chana Hayes, vice-principal of Judaic studies at Cheder Rambam School and Devorah Teitelbaum, an alumna of the school who teaches at Torah Academy of Ottawa, are the first Ottawa-area educators to win the six-year-old awards, which recognize outstanding Jewish educators throughout North America from diverse backgrounds and denominations.

This year's recipients of the New York-based award include 64 educators from 38 cities.

The winners each receive a $1,000 cash prize from their local federation, as well as a plaque and a $1,500 stipend for professional development from the Grinspoon Foundation and Jewish Life Network.

Other Canadian winners include Donna Robins of Temple Sinai's religious school in Toronto, Zehava Chaimovitz of the Kehila Jewish Community Day School in Hamilton, and Simona Parynte of Montreal.

On Nov. 2, Cheder Rambam held a ceremony to honour Hayes and Teitelbaum.

Hayes spoke with emotion about how she and her husband moved to Ottawa from Crown Heights, N.Y., nearly 30 years ago, leaving behind most of her family and a strong Lubavitch community.

"We were determined to live our lives as emissaries of the Rebbe," she said, referring to the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

In Ottawa, the couple dedicated themselves to educating children.

"We started Maimonides [which evolved into Cheder Rambam School] with five children in the kitchen of our apartment," Hayes said.

With the strong support of her husband, Rabbi David Hayes, who assumed domestic duties and made sure their growing family was taken care of when she was needed at school, Hayes has devoted herself to her students and educational responsibilities.

Rabbi Yehoshua Botnick, Cheder Rambam's educational director, said that "Hayes' unique ability to excite and inspire preschool students and older students alike is extraordinary."

Hayes spends hours preparing study aids that are tailored to individual students and classes, he said.

"Throughout the years, she has written a customized synopsis of each weekly Torah portion personalized to emphasize points that are most pressing for the class in question. These sheets, written in her unique calligraphy, have become famous in the community," Rabbi Botnick said.

Teitelbaum teaches grades 1 and 2 at Torah Academy. In her seven years of teaching, she has worked with children from preschool to Grade 10.

In recommending Teitelbaum for the award, Rabbi Botnick described her as "a teacher's teacher.

"Her creativity in the classroom and her ability to reach the most difficult students are extraordinary.

"In addition to her full-time teaching responsibilities, Miss Teitelbaum publishes Torah Treasures, a weekly collection of Torah, inspiration and illustration that features the work of Torah Academy of Ottawa students," and is distributed each week to local synagogues, he said.

Israeli journalist posed as Palestinian during intifadah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israeli television journalist Yoram Binur has had first-hand experience "behind the lines," having lived among the Palestinian people, posing as one of them during the first intifadah.

The story of his double life was published in his book My Enemy, Myself, which has been translated into many languages, including Arabic.

Binur, now Palestinian Affairs correspondent for Channel 2 News on Israeli television, recently toured Canadian campuses at the invitation of National Campus Life. Following visits to Toronto, Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver, he spoke at Carleton University early in November.

In a noon-hour talk titled "The New Gaza: What's Really Going On?" Binur provided historical background to the present situation in the area, including a description of the various parties involved. He also provided insights into the psychology behind strategies and events, information that the average North American would not get from local media.

What Binur discovered by living as a Palestinian is that "they are very similar to us and we are very similar to them and that is sometimes part of the problem." He says that "the average person on the street [Palestinian] says he wants peace, that it is bad to kill women and children…"

The current uprising, known as the second intifadah, is very different from the first intifadah. "The current uprising is a 'professional' uprising, not engaged in by all the Palestinian people, but just by organized groups," Binur said.

The Palestinian Authority, the governing body of the Palestinians, and Mahmoud Abbas, PA president, are ineffective, Binur said. "Abu Mazen [Abbas] is a millionaire, not a man of the people. There is no way that a man from a refugee camp will obey him." said Binur.

He added that he is in favour of releasing [Fatah leader] Marwan Bargutti from prison in Israel to take on the leadership of the Palestinians. "It is not an emotional issue, but a practical one," he said.

Binur concluded his talk by showing a video he had made in Jenin, "the suicide bomber capital." He interviewed several Palestinians, members of Hamas, two of whom have since been killed. In the video, they spoke openly of their plans to kill any and every Jew they encountered.

"Why do I show this story?" asked Binur. "For them, the fight is not over a border – it is a fight for existence. As long as there are Jews in Israel, the fight continues.

"This story also raises the issue of the ethics of the correspondent. In TV, when you interview someone, you give them a stage. Is it correct that when I interviewed these people, I gave them, killers of Israelis, a stage?

"I do believe that if you want to or not, we are dealing with these people. In general, I believe that people should see things even if they do not like them because you need to make decisions and my job is to get the information out," Binur said.

Before leaving Ottawa, he met with officials at the Department of Foreign Affairs, where he gave Canadian officials his view of the Middle East situation.

Rice and Sharon disagree on Hamas' role in PA vote

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A dispute arose on Monday between Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice over the issue of Hamas' participation in Palestinian elections slated for January.

In their morning meeting, Sharon said allowing Hamas to take part in the elections for the Palestinian Legislative Council would be a grave error, and would only weaken Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, rather than strengthening him as Palestinians have argued.

"We will not interfere with the elections," Sharon declared, "but neither will we coordinate the elections with [the Palestinians], and we will not allow Hamas people to operate and move around differently from what is happening now."

It is not clear whether Israel will permit registration of voters in East Jerusalem and allow Hamas candidates to move about freely.

In recent weeks, the Israel Defence Forces have arrested hundreds of Hamas activists, most of them members of the organization's political wing, those most likely to run as candidates in the January election or take central roles in Hamas election campaigns.

Hamas' participation in the election could spell the end of the road map peace plan, Sharon said – that is, if an armed terror group became a political partner to Palestinian rule.

"We wholeheartedly support President Bush's moves for democratization, but we will not aid Hamas. We will not aid the murderers of Jews, even if they take part in elections," Sharon said.

Rice took issue with Sharon's position, saying that after the election, it would be easier to force Hamas to diasarm, since the pressure would be coming from the international community as a whole.

She said she respects the Israeli position, but added that if Abbas fails to disarm Hamas, he will lose the support of the United States and of the world.

Rice said Washington would then shun contacts with Hamas and the Islamic Jihad, even if they were part of the government.

Rice, in Ramallah later in the day for talks with Abbas, said a deal between Israel and the Palestinians on the passage of goods and people through Gaza's border with Egypt was "in sight."

Abbas told a joint news conference that an agreement was imminent, and one Palestinian official said Rice had already clinched the deal.

The compromise was hammered out in Rice's separate talks with Sharon and Abbas, the official said. The fate of the Rafah crossing has been a major sticking point since Israel's Gaza pullout.

Rice met Monday morning with Sharon and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, and repeated her intention to continue working with Israel and the Palestinian Authority toward a two-state solution.

"I expect to continue to work with you and your camp, and to progress toward the two-state solution in which Israel and the Palestinian state can live in peace, free and free of terror," said Rice, opening the meeting.

Rice again praised Sharon for the implementation of the disengagement from the Gaza Strip. But she also demanded that Sharon step up negotiations over opening the border crossing in Rafah to enable free passage between the Gaza Strip and Egypt, and expand the activity of the Karni cargo terminal, which is considered the bottleneck of the Palestinian economy in the Gaza Strip.

In a meeting with the managers of the Karni cargo terminal on Sunday, James Wolfensohn, special Mideast envoy for the Quartet (United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations), called the next 72 hours "critical to his mission," which has so far failed to yield any results.

A high-level meeting Sunday intended to have Israelis and Palestinians reach an agreement on operating the Rafah crossing ended in a stalemate. Wolfensohn met with Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and PA Minister Mohammed Dahlan, but did not resolve the key dispute: Israel's demand for information on those entering via the crossing in time to thwart the entry of people involved in terror. According to Israeli sources, the Palestinians toughened their stance at the meeting.

Wolfensohn tried to increase pressure, emphasizing that he wants to reach an agreement on the crossing this week. He said Israel's entrenching itself in security considerations will transform the Gaza Strip into an enormous prison.

He said he is frustrated by the lack of change in the atmosphere between Israelis and Palestinians and the risk that Gaza will become a huge prison. He said without progress in talks, he would consider going home.

He said he planned to report his concerns to Rice.

In a speech on Sunday in Jerusalem to the Saban Forum, an annual U.S.-Israeli symposium, Rice gave her strongest condemnation of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's recent call for Israel to be "wiped off the map."

"No civilized nation" can call for the annihilation of another, Rice said to resounding applause. "No civilized nation should have a leader who wishes or hopes or desires or considers it a matter of policy to express that… another country should be pushed into the sea. It is unacceptable in the international system."

She also said the Bush administration is under no illusions about the difficulty of spreading democracy in the region. "We are not naive about the pace or difficulty of democratic change, but we know the longing for democratic change is deep and urgently felt."

Then she addressed the obstacles: "Dismantling the infrastructure of terrorism is essential for peace, because in the final analysis no democratic government can tolerate armed parties with one foot in the realm of politics and one foot in the camp of terrorism."

Rice reiterated the American position, that "if Palestinians fight terrorism and lawless violence and advance democratic reform, and if Israel takes no actions that prejudge a final settlement and works to improve the daily lives of the Palestinians, the possibility of peace is both hopeful and realistic."

She called on the Arab states to increase cooperation with Israel, to establish normal relations with it and strengthen the Palestinian economy.

Sharon also addressed the forum on Sunday. "The coming period is critical for the Palestinian Authority," he said. "It must decide whether it is choosing the path of peace and negotiations, or whether it is opting for the extremist path of terrorism and enabling the existence of terrorist organizations and their participation in the political system, before they have disarmed. Hamas is also required to revoke the Hamas charter, which calls for Israel's destruction.

"The move to the second phase of the road map will only take place after the Palestinian Authority carries out the first phase of the plan, dismantles the terrorist organizations and implements the comprehensive reforms to which it has committed," Sharon added.

Sharon calls Abdullah

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon phoned Jordan's King Abdullah II to convey condolences for last Wednesday's terror attacks in Amman. Sharon said Israel was prepared to immediately render assistance as requested, and he asked the king to convey his condolences to the families of those killed and his best wishes for a quick recovery to the wounded. King Abdullah asked to convey his gratitude to the Israeli people.

Israel threatened, too

A Web statement Friday in the name of Al Qaeda in Iraq claiming responsibility for last week's deadly hotel bombings in Jordan included a threat to Israel. The statement said Jordan, which it described as Israel's "buffer zone," was now "within range" and "it will not be long before raids by the mujahedeen come" to Israel.

PA security forces collapsing?

Palestinian Authority security forces are near collapse, a group of PA security officers said. In a letter to PA President Mahmoud Abbas, the officers said corruption in the security apparatus and increasing anarchy have left the forces on the edge of collapse, the Jerusalem Post reported. The letter is being seen as an effort to embarrass Abbas by portraying him as weak, and some PA security officials said it was written by "disgruntled" officers.

Proof of Goliath found?

An Israeli archeological find could support the biblical story of David slaying Goliath. Aren Maeir of Bar-Ilan University's archeology department said last week that a shard of pottery found at the Tell es-Shafi, believed to be the site of Goliath's hometown Gath, carries inscriptions referring to the giant Philistine warrior. Though the shard dates to around 900 BCE, around a century after Goliath was said to have been killed by a slingshot-wielding David, Maeir said it could be the first independent evidence that the battle recounted in the Book of Samuel is true.

Poll: Israelis ignorant of STDs

Some 23 per cent of Israelis have never heard of common sexually transmitted diseases, a new poll has found. That percentage is much higher than the 8 per cent of people in more than 50 countries who have never heard of the STDs, the Jerusalem Pos reported.

Plan to increase Ethiopians

Ethiopian and Israeli government officials signed an understanding that would double the rate of Ethiopian immigration to Israel. The 20,000 Falash Mora who have been waiting, some of them for years, to come to Israel are descendants of Jews who converted to Christianity, but have since returned to Judaism. The United Jewish Communities, the North American federation umbrella group, will help fund the operation to bring the remainder of the Falash Mora community to Israel.

Peretz victory a development of historic dimensions

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

The election of Amir Peretz, a 53-year-old underdog, as leader of the Labor Party is almost certain to change the face of Israeli politics.

The result of the Nov. 9 Labor primary vote makes more likely the formation of a new centrist party led by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, backed by defectors from Labor and Likud. It creates the potential for a profound change in voting patterns, with many traditional Likud voters among the Sephardi working class likely to consider voting for the Moroccan-born Peretz. It puts Labor squarely on the left of the Israeli political divide, and clarifies its differences with Likud on key peacemaking and economic issues.

And at the very least it almost certainly means that elections, currently slated for November 2006, will be moved up to the first half of the year.

Polls two weeks ago suggested that Labor under Peretz would do well in those elections. Polls in Ha'aretz and Ma'ariv showed Labor rising from its current 21 Knesset seats to 27 or 28 places in the legislature, with the Likud under Sharon winning 37 to 39.

The Ha'aretz poll also shows that if Sharon – who is facing strong internal dissent from Likud members who opposed his Gaza withdrawal plan – breaks away from Likud to form a new centrist party, it would win 32 seats to Labor's 27, with a Likud rump led by former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu finishing third with 25 seats.

Amir Peretz and Shimon Peres [Israel Sun photo]

These results reflect the situation before campaigning has even started. A good campaign could establish the untried Peretz as a bona fide national leader – and, some pundits believe, even could win the election for Labor.

Conversely, now that he's Labor leader, Peretz will become the prime target of Likud barbs. Should he fail to rise to the occasion, Labor's electoral fortunes could plummet.

Much will depend on what happens inside Labor. Peretz won 42.3 per cent of the votes in the primary, scoring a stunning upset over incumbent Shimon Peres (40 per cent) and former party leader Benjamin Ben Eliezer (16.8 per cent), despite the party establishment's efforts to stop him.

Former Prime Minister Ehud Barak pulled out of the race two months ago and joined Peres in an overt bid to block Peretz. Three days before the election, Science Minister Matan Vilnai did the same.

It's still unclear whether Labor heavyweights will accept Peretz's leadership or chip away at his authority from within the party, perhaps even breaking away to join a new centrist grouping under Sharon.

Amram Mitzna, who like Peretz raised great hopes for change when he was elected Labor leader three years ago, resigned after he was constantly undermined by party rivals.

Will Peretz prove to be made of sterner stuff?

His challenges are great because of the very real possibility of a mass defection from Labor – possibly including Peres – to join Sharon. After the primary results were announced, Peres waited a day and a half to congratulate Peretz on his victory – and even after doing so, confirmed that he was taking a "time out" to consider his political future.

Peretz moved quickly to keep the party intact. He convened Labor's Knesset faction last week and asked them to give him a chance to establish himself as leader. He met separately afterward with Peres, urging him to stay in Labor and help lead it.

Whether all this will be enough to keep Labor together remains to be seen.

Sharon's next moves will be decisive. After Likud rebels voted Nov. 7 in the Knesset against two ministerial appointments Sharon wanted to make, aides to the prime minister say a split in Likud is all but certain, and that it's only a matter of timing. After the rebel vote, Sharon himself warned darkly that "there will be consequences."

Whether or not there are major political realignments, elections will probably be moved up to some time between March and May of next year. Peretz has made it clear that he intends to pull Labor out of the governing coalition within six weeks, and he and Sharon are due to meet soon to agree on a new election date.

Some Likud leaders, including Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, express concern at Peretz's potential to attract working-class Likud voters. Peretz himself told JTA that surveys he conducted showed that the Sephardi poor no longer see the Likud as their natural political home, opening up huge electoral possibilities for Labor.

Peretz was born in Morocco in 1952, came to Israel at age four and grew up in a poor home in the southern development town of Sderot. A gifted and charismatic speaker with a trademark handlebar moustache, he became mayor of Sderot at age 31, a Labor Knesset member at 36 and chairman of the Histadrut trade union federation at 43.

In 1997, Peretz left Labor to form his own political party, One Nation, which won just three seats in the last election. He brought his party back into Labor late last year – with Peres' help, ironically.

Peretz's political views are clear: on the Palestinian issue, he's a dove who believes in the feasibility of a final peace agreement; on the economy, he believes in free-market forces to create wealth and government intervention to distribute it more evenly.

On both the Palestinian and economic issues, he talks about a "moral road map" and says the occupation of the West Bank must end because it's corrupting for Israelis. He promises that if he becomes prime minister "there will not be a single hungry child" in Israel, and that he will raise the minimum wage to $1,000 a month.

His political opponents on the right and in the centre paint Peretz as a dangerous peacenik and Bolshevik who will take untenable risks with the Palestinians and whose radical populism will destroy the economy, which after the Sharon government's free-market reforms has pulled out of a deep recession to show impressive growth.

For now, however, Peretz is getting sympathetic press. Several pundits praise him for being ready to go for a final peace deal and drop Sharon's conditioning of peace talks on the dismantling of Palestinian terrorist groups.

On the economy, leading analysts dismiss the Bolshevik tag and depict Peretz as a sane and well-balanced social democrat in the model of Bill Clinton or Tony Blair.

It's far too early to judge how significant Peretz's emergence as a key player on the national stage will be.

But if Israel's normally hard-nosed commentators are anything to go by, his upset victory could prove to be a development of historic dimensions.

French riots not a 'Jewish problem'

By LAUREN ELKIN
JTA

PARIS — Some media are calling it a "suburban intifada," but the rioting that is rocking France is a national problem, not a Jewish one.

That appears to be the consensus of French Jews, who are simultaneously alarmed at the widespread violence – mostly of Muslim youths – in suburbs around the country and relieved that Jews have not been directly targeted, as they were at the height of the Palestinian intifada.

"Anti-Semitism in these neighbourhoods has drastically declined over the last six months or so," said Sammy Ghozlan, who heads the Office of Vigilance Against Anti-Semitism. He is also the president of the Council of Jewish Communities of Seine St-Denis, the Paris suburb where much of the violence, which began at the end of October, has taken place.

The earlier violence against Jews "was just a pretext for these groups of people to violently express their dissatisfaction with their lot in life. Now, the anger that was being channelled toward the Jews is instead being directed at the French state. Instead of Jews, they're attacking the police," said Ghozlan, a former police officer.

He added that unlike in earlier rebellions, "today, there's an element of Islamic fundamentalism in it which is disturbing."

Many of the rioters are descended from North African immigrants, but local Islamic groups have condemned the violence, and analysts have been quick to point out that some of the perpetrators of the arson and beatings come from Sub-Saharan Africa.

Jewish organizations in France and abroad are keeping relatively quiet about the situation. CRIF, the umbrella group of secular Jewish organizations, declined to comment on the violence, saying this is a French problem with no link to the Jewish community.

The Jewish community has been affected by some incidents, but these are seen as part of the larger acts of violence.

Two synagogues have been damaged: on Nov. 3, a Molotov cocktail blackened the door of a synagogue in the suburb of Pierrefitte, and the next evening, a Friday night, a device was detonated outside the synagogue in the suburb of Garges-les-Gonesse.

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin telephoned the president of the CRIF, Roger Cukierman, after these attacks.

Cars were burned in central Paris, not far from the Rue des Rosiers, a street lined with Jewish merchants, restaurants and synagogues. In Aulnay-sous-Bois, the storefront of a small Jewish rug merchant was burned; in Aubervilliers, a fabric warehouse also believed to be owned by Jews, was burned.

Despite the relative silence, the Jewish community remains wary.

Rabbi Yossi Gorodetsky, an American Chabad representative in Paris, said: "We just don't want to see this turn into a problem of anti-Semitism. They're very clear about why they're angry and who they're angry with."

"The rioters are not distinguishing between hospitals, schools or synagogues," said Philip Carmel, international relations director for the Conference of European Rabbis. The violence has also affected mosques and churches as well. At the beginning of the riots, a mosque was damaged when a bomb containing tear gas was thrown through the window.

"The anti-Semitism we've been seeing over the past few years was a warning sign for these events," Carmel said.

"It's not that the French are anti-Semitic," he said. "It's that there is something deeply wrong with French society in its failure to integrate its North African youth.

"France has alienated 10 per cent of its population," he said, "and now the government is finding it has to deal with their needs."

Groups such as SOS-Racisme, which speaks out against anti-Semitism and other forms of racism, have expressed dissatisfaction with the government's response to the violence.

"We are astonished at the insufficiency of the measures taken by the government to curb the violence," SOS-Racisme said.

"For over 20 years, SOS-Racisme has warned of the dangers of ghettoization and of the social and political consequences of racial discrimination," the group's president, Dominique Sopo, said in a recent statement.

"Words are not enough to change the everyday existence of this part of the population. What they need, what they want, particularly among the adolescents, are strong acts of public power."

Many groups, including SOS-Racisme, have criticized the media's insistence on comparing the riots to the Palestinian uprisings.

Rabbi Gabriel Farhi, with the Liberal Movement of French Jews, wrote on a Jewish community website that while the term "intifada" might seem applicable from a certain point of view, the Palestinian uprisings against Israel are much more difficult and complicated than those of the French suburbs.

The political consequences of the riots may be grave for Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, who has received much of the blame for the escalation of the violence after reportedly referring to the rioters as "scum."

Sarkozy and de Villepin are considered to be political rivals for the presidency in 2007.

"If Sarkozy resigns," as many have called on him to do, "the rioters will feel that they have won," Ghozlan said.

Hundreds of evacuated settlers protest their new living conditions

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hundreds of former settlers from Gaza and the northern West Bank held a demonstration last Tuesday in front of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Jerusalem residence to protest their housing conditions since their evacuation under the disengagement plan.

The protesters waved placards reading "81 days without a home," "There isn't a solution for every settler" and "You placed us in a golden prison," a reference to the Gold Hotel in Jerusalem where some evacuees are being housed.

Protesters also torched garbage cans with the names of the evacuated settlements. A garbage truck was then brought in to illustrate the authorities' attitude toward them.

Eda Zeliger, a mother of seven who was evacuated from Gush Katif in Gaza, where she used to run a shop, spoke of her life in the Gold Hotel.

"I wouldn't wish this to anyone," Zeliger said.

"Yesterday we received a phone call from a lawyer who told us we would be able to receive a first payment. I called the [disengagement] administration to request the money. They told me I have to sign that I left [home] before Aug. 15. I refused. I would never sign that, even if it meant losing the compensation money," she told a cheering crowd."

Representatives of the evacuees offered a detailed description of the "series of troubles and humiliations they undergo every day."

Members of the Lema'an Achai (For the sake of my brother) movement gave the example of the dire situation of evacuees in one Ashkelon hotel that was disqualified from housing settlers due to poor sanitary conditions, but where many evacuees were nevertheless placed. According to the group, evacuees were not given regular meals and electricity.

The settlers were to hold a second protest in front of Sharon's residence later in the week.

The protesters were also scheduled to hold a ceremony in Jerusalem to award some 1,500 certificates to settlers who resisted the evacuation, IDF soldiers who refused evacuation orders and protesters who were arrested and put in prison for their anti-disengagement activities.

Two months after Israel completed its withdrawal, 75 per cent of the evacuees still have no source of income, according to a report published last week by the Yesha Council of settlements in the West Bank.

According to the report, 65 per cent of the evacuees still live in temporary housing, including hotels and guest houses.

The report says the temporary homes that were erected in Nitzan house 80 families from Nisanit, 80 families from Neve Dekalim, most of the residents of Bedolah and the residents of Rafiah Yam.

Examining UNRWA

Earlier this month in New York, Bedein presented a study about UNRWA to international reporters who cover the UN.

The report, UNRWA, A Hard Look at an Agency in Trouble, was prepared by the Center for Near East Policy Research under the supervision of Bedein's Israel Resource News Agency. His briefing, Bedein said, was meant to give reporters the tools they need to better understand the controversial issues concerning UNRWA – particularly its intense politicization (in favour of the Palestinians), its employment of Hamas personnel and its misuse of its facilities to support attacks against Israel.

At around the same time Bedein was meeting with reporters, the UN began a review of the agency's work and various international figures pronounced on the agency's efficacy.

Israel's deputy prime minister and foreign minister, Silvan Shalom met with newly appointed UNRWA commissioner general Karen Koning AbuZayd and said he felt an improvement in the atmosphere.

Shalom suggested that in the aftermath of the Gaza disengagement, UNRWA ought to transfer its education, health and employment functions to the Palestinian Authority (PA). Such a transfer could strengthen the position of the PA and weaken Hamas' efforts to replace UNRWA.

In the United States, Margaret Scobey, the United States' ambassador to Syria, told the UN General Assembly that UNRWA's humanitarian assistance to Palestinians was a stabilizing force in the region.

"UNRWA has an important role to play in supporting the efforts of the Palestinian Authority" and of international organizations, with the goal of "launch[ing] economic recovery and development in Gaza and the West Bank," JTA reported the ambassador as saying.

That's likely not the kind of endorsement Bedein would find palatable. He said UNRWA has kept Palestinian refugees in a state of dependence while prolonging their suffering. The UNHCR, whose mandate is to assist all other refugees worldwide, is able to successfully settle people so they can get on with their lives. "Their job is to resettle people as fast as possible and with as much dignity as possible," he said.

Unlike the UNHCR, UNRWA makes no attempts at permanently resettling Palestinian refugees, he said. On the contrary, the agency has adopted Palestinian nationalists' claim that those people displaced from pre-1948 Israel will someday recover their residences. UNRWA bases that approach on UN Resolution 194, passed shortly after Israel became an independent state.

Bedein suggested that is a one-sided interpretation of the resolution – which anyway does not have the force of law – since it also requires returning refugees to live in peace. Those who do not return can receive compensation. UNRWA ignores those aspects of the resolution, he said.

In a written response to CJN queries, Marie-Christine Lilkoff, a spokesperson for Foreign Affairs Canada, said that "UNRWA provides essential services to over four million Palestinian refugees. Its work is supported financially by donors that include the United States, U.K. and the European Commission. The United States alone provided more than $127 million to UNRWA in 2004. Its work is also supported (although not financially) by Israel, which recognizes the critical role that UNRWA plays.

"While it is widely known that the relationship between the previous [UNRWA] commissioner general and Israel was a difficult one, the relationship between the current ComGen and Israel is known to be very positive. Israeli officials have frequently expressed support for the assistance Canada provides to UNRWA.

"Canada's commitment to UNRWA remains strong, and we are working closely with other donors, including the United States, to support the organization as it continues to reform its programming and management mechanisms and procedures."

Lilkoff did not respond to questions concerning the alleged infiltration of UNRWA by Hamas.

"The vast majority of the 25,000 employees of UNRWA are themselves refugees and they are frequently themselves associated with terrorist groups," the report UNRWA: A Hard Look at an Agency in Trouble alleges, adding that UNRWA facilities are used by terrorists and terrorists receive UNRWA benefits and assistance.

Other findings in the report include:

- UNRWA accepts as refugees the great-grandchildren of those who lost there homes in 1948. The 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees does not define refugees' descendants as inheriting their status.
- UNRWA refugee totals are inflated.
- The UNRWA education system employs PA textbooks, which present an entirely negative image of Israel and deny Jewish links to the Holy Land.
- UNRWA won't suspend aid to known terrorists because of intimidation.
- UNRWA's budget per refugee in 2005 is almost $100 (US). UNHCR's budget per refugee in the same year is around $65 (US).

Agency 'has kept Palestinian refugees in a state of dependence'

In a statement to the special political and decolonization committee earlier this month, AbuZayd said she had met with PA President Mahmoud Abbas, and "he emphasized that the disengagement from the Gaza Strip has not changed the status of Palestine refugees within the strip, as the refugee issue is one to be dealt with in final status negotiations."

UNRWA has defended its activities in a Web document titled Setting the Record Straight. The agency asserts it does not run the refugee camps, but merely provides humanitarian and other services. The agency denies any of its installations have been turned into bomb-making factories.

It also states it "is not in the business of hiring terrorists. It has in place very strict standards of conduct, and it expects all of its area and international staff members to adhere to them" – to perform their duties fairly and refrain from political activities that might reflect on the agency impartiality and independence.

UNRWA says its staff union "is not staffed by representatives of any militant or political group or party" such as Hamas.

As to the contention that UNRWA perpetuates the refugee problem, Setting the Record Straight states a solution will require a political settlement. "UNRWA was established to cater to the humanitarian needs of the refugees pending such a political settlement. Removing UNRWA from the scene would not cause the refugee problem to disappear, but it would lead to untold suffering and hardship."

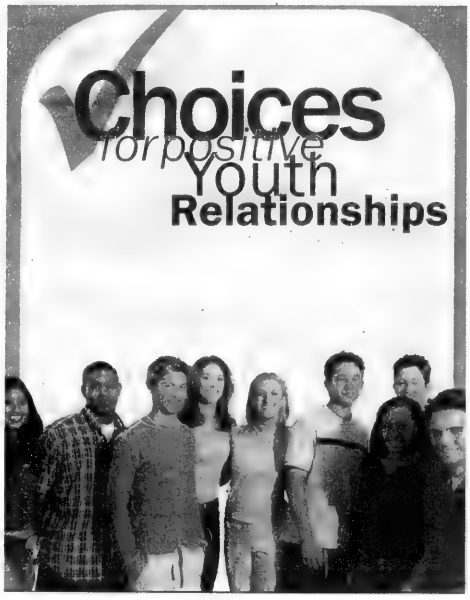
Abusive relationships among teens explored

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dawna Speers has spent the past 14 years trying to turn a personal tragedy into something positive.

In the years since her 19-year-old daughter was murdered by her ex-boyfriend Adam, Speers founded the Speers Society, an organization committed to preventing youth relationship abuse through education and support.



Speaking to members of Jewish Women International/Canada at their recent convention, Speers said that shortly after her daughter's death, she became involved with Canadians Against Violence Everywhere, a grassroots organization that has since closed, which served as a non-partisan voice for all Canadians working together for safety, peace and justice. In her work, she spoke to thousands of students, she said.

"I told [my daughter's] story because I wanted to try and prevent other youth from walking in either Monica's or Adam's footsteps."

Eight years later, Monica's story evolved into the 20-minute National Film Board award-winning documentary A Love That Kills, which talks about her situation and identifies warning signs of abusive relationships.

The documentary, which was written from the transcripts of Adam's trial, became the film board's bestselling documentary, she said, "which proves that if there were not abuse out there, the film would not be popular. I had no idea how much impact the documentary would have."

The film is designed to be a catalyst for discussion, Speers said. "We advise [those screening it] to provide an introduction beforehand, and have a discussion afterwards. Youth need an opportunity to talk with peers and informed adults."

The society has also developed Choices for Positive Relationships, a program for youth that emphasizes respect and safety for young men and women within any of their relationships.

Program goals are to identify warning signs of abuse, develop skills to sustain positive relationships and direct youth to supportive community resources.

Speers told the group that abuse is something that no one wants to talk about, "but it is important [not to ignore it]. Abuse is the oppression, harassment or intimidation of others, verbally, physically or both, and it exists in schools, at home and in the workplace. Everyone can remember an abusive, controlling person."

Males are more likely to offend with their fists, she said, but females are more subtle. "They may start a whisper campaign or spread rumours. This can be equally as damaging.

"Abuse occurs on a continuum. It may start with minor words, and then it can accelerate to pushing and so on, right up to guns and knives. When [an abuser] gets the desired results, abuse is used over and over again."

Citing statistics from the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, Speers said that one in four males and females are victims of abuse, one in three report being bullied, and 54 per cent of girls and boys have experienced sexual abuse.

In her visits across the country, she said, about 46 per cent of students surveyed expressed concern regarding the number of violent incidents at their school, and 12 per cent reported they felt unsafe at school.

"Understanding and identifying the power and control issues that undermine healthy relationships are critical factors in violence prevention.

"In every community we have visited throughout Canada, young people have come forward to disclose their personal stories of abuse and ask for help to change their lives, in order to live in safety and peace."

Also at the convention, Lucy Alt was installed as JWI/Canada president.

Documentary examines anti-Semitism and conspiracy theories

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Marc Levin, who made the documentary Protocols of Zion, meets with neo-Nazi Shaun Walker.

Insidious conspiracy theories, all revolving around that anti-Semitic czarist tract, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, have sprouted like noxious weeds since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The first theory holds that the Mossad, Israel's external spy agency, planned them.

The second one claims that 4,000 Jews who normally worked at the World Trade Center in Manhattan stayed at home on that day of infamy after having been forewarned by the Mossad.

The third theory, directly related to the infamous Protocols and a staple of neo-Nazi discourse, posits the claim that Jews are working to take over the world.

Marc Levin's documentary, Protocols of Zion, which opens in local theatres on Nov. 18, explores anti-Semitism against the backdrop of these preposterous propositions.

Levin, a New York filmmaker who lives near the site of what was the World Trade Centre, dons the mantle of Michael Moore in Fahrenheit 911 in this somewhat interesting film.

Posing direct, sometimes provocative questions about Jews, he engages Arab Americans, black nationalists, neo-Nazi skinheads and Holocaust deniers, among others, in often combative conversations.

He asks his questions against the volatile backdrop of the second Palestinian uprising, the resurgence of open anti-Semitism around the globe, the invasion of Iraq, the assertion by Malaysia's former prime minister that Jews rule the universe through proxies, the release of Mel Gibson's supposedly subliminally anti-Semitic film, The Passion of the Christ, and the appearance of blatantly anti-Jewish dramas on Arab television stations.

Protocols of Zion opens as a young African-American man declares, "No Jew died in the World Trade Center," an assertion wildly at odds with the facts. "America is Jewish," he adds for good measure.

Levin is shocked by the bigotry, but when an Egyptian taxi driver informs him that "it's all written in the Protocols," Levin acknowledges that his heretofore airy dismissal of the Protocols as "a joke" is no longer sustainable.

Levin begins his journey to the conspiratorial world of anti-Semitic fantasy by paying a visit to Walid Rabah. He is the Palestinian-American publisher of The Arab Voice in Patterson, N.J., which carried excerpts of the Protocols after Sept. 11.

Rabah wants to have it both ways. He published the Protocols to "educate" his readers, but he freely admits that he is perpetuating a lie of historic proportions.

"It's fake and it's not true," he says, hardly absolving himself of incitement to hatred.

Travelling south to Virginia, Levin interviews Shaun Walker, the mild-mannered fuhrer of the National Alliance, a white-power outfit that peddles Nazi memorabilia, books and boots embossed with swastikas.

Walker opines that Hitler's Mein Kampf is substantive and that the Protocols is "a timeless work." He voices skepticism that six million Jews were murdered in the Holocaust and claims that Australian publishing titan Rupert Murdoch is actually Jewish.

Levin's encounter with Frank Weltner, the mastermind of the anti-Semitic "Jew Watch" Internet site, is less instructive.

He next meets white and black prisoners in a maximum security jail in New Jersey. "These Jews are really trying to take over the world," a white guy says without any particular animus. But judging by Levin's interviews with other jailbirds, his claim does not appear to reflect opinion behind prison walls.

As Gibson's controversial movie is being readied for national distribution, Levin phones several Jewish Hollywood bigshots to take part in a panel discussion of The Passion of the Christ. But Larry David, Norman Lear and Rob Reiner politely decline.

To illustrate his supposition that the Arab-Israeli conflict has reinforced belief in the Protocols, which was on sale at the recent Frankfurt Book Fair, Levin shows current Arab film clips.

In the first, an attractive twentysomething woman urges a three-year-old girl to repeat the line that Jews are apes and pigs, and in the second, an Iraqi imam angrily denounces Jews.

All these exchanges and clips shed more heat than light on the nature of modern anti-Semitism. Levin glosses over the surface, and doesn't dig deep enough. No one even faintly familiar with the wellsprings of anti-Semitism will be surprised by the content of Levin's film.

Documentary on Sderot: Chutzpa Productions presents Qassam, a new short documentary about Sderot, Israel, and how its citizens are affected by the more than 900 Qassam rocket attacks that have been fired on them from the Gaza Strip. Produced and directed by Toronto filmmaker Igal Hecht, Qassam examines the uncertainty of daily life in Sderot in the two years before the Gaza disengagement.

With Qassam missiles still raining on Sderot, the film allows the viewer to sense the life of a low-income city that lives under a constant threat of Palestinian terror. To be aired on the CTS show Israel Today (Channel 9), hosted by Howard Adelman. Nov. 20, 9 p.m.

Stage show brings '60s humour to new generation

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

A car hit a Jewish man. The paramedic asks, "Are you comfortable?" The man replies, "I make a good living."

Chances are, if you're under 30, you haven't heard a good Jewish joke like this Henny Youngman classic in a long time. The older your grandparents get, the closer these jokes get to extinction. One Toronto producer, though, hopes to teach a new generation of Jews how to laugh at themselves.

"I'm worried about our children not knowing Yiddish and not knowing Holocaust survivors. I also don't want them to lose the Jewish humour," says Howard Szigeti, the brains behind the first-ever stage production of the classic 1960s comedy album, You Don't Have To Be Jewish.

Szigeti decided to bring You Don't Have To Be Jewish, originally created by comic Bob Booker in 1965, to the stage after he rediscovered the album a year ago. As soon as he was done laughing, a light bulb went off.

"I knew I had a cool off-Broadway idea. I called Bob Booker and asked him, 'Is anyone knocking on your door to present You Don't Have To Be Jewish?' He said no and asked if I was interested."

Szigeti didn't have to push Booker too hard to get him to say yes to his idea.

"I'm taking this play to Toronto and he's in for a percentage of the profits. He'd be a shmegegee not to do it," says Szigeti.

The play, which stars Jamie Farr of *M*A*S*H* fame, will likely draw the bubbies and zaides to the theatre, but Szigeti really wants the 20-somethings to revel in their grandparents' humour.

"The reason why I picked up the phone and called Bob Booker was to make sure there was a revival of sorts. To make sure the next generation are aware of who we are. This is Jewish humour. We live it every day. It's the way we talk with our hands, it's the way we give smart-aleck retorts. Jews seem to be faster at answering a question with a question."

Howard Szigeti with Jordan's Queen Noor.

How does Szigeti know that this humour will click with the youths?

"I played it for my daughter, who went to CHAT, and she was laughing hysterically. She doesn't have the same reference point as I do. I asked her, 'You find this stuff funny?' and she said, 'Ya, this is awesome.' Maybe this humour really is universal."

Szigeti, who's 50, remembers the days when "everybody was a comedian." Now though, he rarely hears a good Jewish joke and he's concerned.

"We live in a very fast-paced, assimilated time. The more we remove ourselves from babas and zaides, we are going to become more secular and we'll lose some of the flavour of Europe. Back in the days of Toronto, in the '60s, everyone was a comedian… I don't have any concerns that we're unplugged from synagogue – on a religious level, Judaism will survive another 5,000 years, but it's the cultural values that are at risk. Jewish humour is at risk, and this album is an important pill to swallow."

Rejuvenating Jewish culture is no easy task, so finding the right conduit for old-school European comedy was important. While the lead role in 1965 went to comedic giant Lou Jacobi, Szigeti settled on Farr, a comedic genius in his own right.

"The little I knew about Jamie, I knew he was a good team player," says Szigeti. "He wasn't a prima donna, he had a good marquee value and he was a quick study. I never second-guessed the decision, and when I flew down to Los Angeles to meet him, I knew I had found the right guy."

Szigeti, who created the Unique Lives and Experiences series, which features prominent women speaking about their lives, also hasn't second-guessed his decision to put on You Don't Have To Be Jewish. After two nights in Toronto (Nov. 19 and 20 at Massey Hall), he's taking the show to Florida and Los Angeles and hopes he can "run with it for 10 years."

Whether or not this play will last that long isn't the point. Szigeti's goal is to bring Jewish humour to a new generation – and be remembered for it.

"Sure, I'm a little conceited. I give myself credit for being inventive and creative. Coming up with You Don't Have To Be Jewish is a good thing. Hopefully people will start to realize, 'Thanks to Howard, my kids got a little insulin of comedy. Thank goodness there are guys like Howard.' If that's what it reads on my epitaph, then that would be cool," Szigeti said.

You Don't Have To Be Jewish plays at Massey Hall on Nov. 19 and 20. For tickets, call 417-872-4255 or visit www.roythomsonhall.com.

Filmmaker tackles Sderot Qassams

By DAVID GORDON
Special to The CJN

Coty used to worry about her mortgage, the welfare of her children, and how she would pay for things she needs. Now she worries about the Qassam, the Palestinian missiles that regularly rain down on her town, Sderot, in southern Israel, from the neighbouring Palestinian town, Bet Chanun, about a half kilometre away.

After seeing a small story in an Israeli newspaper about Sderot's Qassam threats, Toronto filmmaker Igal Hecht was outraged. "What really angered me was what happened on Sept. 30 in 2004. Two young kids were killed at once," he says. His response was to make a documentary about the city and how it copes with constant missile attacks.

Coty Malka's daughter, Taeer, is afraid to walk to school.

Two weeks later, Hecht found himself in the city of 20,000, among its people, its destroyed homes and its streets. Hecht began interviewing people like Coty, a mother of a kindergarten-aged girl, both of whose lives are lived in fear.

"These are people who lost friends and families… Sderot and the surrounding area have been hit by more than a thousand Qassams in the past year," Hecht says. "The media will do documentaries and reports on checkpoints, suicide bombs and Gaza, but nothing in Sderot. Filmmakers rush to film Palestinians suffering, but they don't care about Israelis."

Qassam is about the city of Sderot and the lives of those who are affected by the attacks. Filmed three weeks after the murder of the two preschoolers, Qassam looks at the uncertainty of daily life that has plagued the city in the last two years.

"Qassams are just as deadly as suicide bombers, packed with nails and shrapnel, to inflict as much injury and death as possible," Hecht says. "The 'ideal time' to send is between 7:30 a.m. and 8:15 a.m., when parents are walking their children to school."

One family in the film saw first-hand horror during Sukkot last year, when a Qassam hit their sukkah directly, killing two-year-old Yuval Ababe and four-year- old Dorit Insu.

"Imagine being bombarded by missiles every other day. The government is supposed to provide basic security, but this is three years of being ignored by the government. They sit idly by while missiles rain down on a city," says Hecht. "If this was Tel Aviv, they'd be shaking the world."

To date, very little has been done for the people of Sderot. Coming off the heels of a city-wide protest that garnered publicity and obligatory political photo- ops, the military eventually retaliated against the attacks by killing one of the chief Qassam makers.

A "red dawn" alarm system was supposed to have been installed by officials. "Of course," Hecht says, "it tells them 20 minutes after the missiles hit."

According to Hecht, the city has no funding for ambulances; they have a part-time bomb expert on rotation, and just three "dilapidated" fire trucks. One child died, he says, because the ambulance was 20 minutes late – it had to come from Ashkelon, 15 minutes out of the way.

Since its establishment six years ago, Hecht's film company, Chutzpa Productions, has had films in festivals worldwide on a yearly basis, many dealing with Israeli and Jewish themes.

Qassam will be shown on Toronto's CTS show Israel Today (Channel 9) on Nov. 20 at 9 p.m. It will include a short interview with Hecht.

Page-turner about psychoanalysis has many twists

Freudian-thriller by Toronto novelist is a classic whodunit

Seduction* by Catherine Gildiner, Knopf Canada.

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When Anders Konzak, the new director of the Freud Academy, announces he has evidence that will prove Freud was a fraud and that psychoanalysis is based on a lie, his findings threaten to turn the psychiatric world upside down.

This is the interesting premise of Catherine Gildiner's novel Seduction, a thrilling page-turner with so many twists, it makes The Da Vinci Code child's play by comparison.

The protagonist is Kate Fitzgerald who is in prison for killing her husband. A student of Darwinism, she has a PhD in philosophy of science. Incarcerated for the past eight years, she has taken an interest in early Freud and has been allowed to publish articles in academic publications.

Kate's psychiatrist in prison, whom she loathes and considers incompetent, Dr. Gardonne, shocks her one day when he offers her a temporary absence.

Gardonne tells her that the North American Psychoanalytical Association is justifiably anxious about Konzak's alleged findings and wants to find out what he knows and prevent him from publishing anything that could harm the profession.

Gardonne wants Kate to investigate Konzak. Self-interest is at the heart of his concern, she realizes. If the public believes Konzak's findings, then analysts like Gardonne would be out of work.

This set-up appears on the surface to be a bit contrived but works well in the context of the novel. Gardonne believes Konzak would be naturally suspicious, and wouldn't talk to other psychiatrists. But Konzak would easily open up to an outsider who has displayed an academic interest in Freud. Plus he's read Kate's articles and is interested in meeting her.

Kate wouldn't be working alone. She's the brains of this operation. Her partner, Jackie Lawton, an ex-con turned private investigator, will be the brawn.

The novel's pace is fast. Kate and Jackie, unwilling partners, travel to Vienna, London, New York and Toronto. When the people they talk to meet violent deaths, the partners become suspicious of each other – and the novel enters the realm of the classic whodunit.

Along the way we discover the links between Freud and Darwin. And why do all the suspects have a fascination, as Kate does, with Wedgwood china?

We met an impressive cast of shady characters: Dvorah Little, a journalist of questionable ethics, who holds something on Gardonne; Konzak, the egotistical Freudian who's made enemies in the psychoanalytical world; Dr. Conrad Von Enchanhauer, an Auschwitz survivor with a terrible secret he's desperate to keep hidden; Anna, Freud's beloved daughter; Bozo, a Freudian detective of sorts who lives in an apartment more fantastic than anything described in Alice in Wonderland, and his two roommates, Shawna, the agoraphobic jewelry designer, and the mysterious china collector and fire-eater who goes by the name The Wizard.

The characters are very strong in this novel. Kate and Jackie are two loners who must put aside their suspicions of each other to work together. Kate is analytical, yet paranoid. Jackie is rough and vulgar, yet shows a sensitive side. Kate has a witty, sarcastic streak to her, quick with tongue, and short of temper.

She carries grudges well too. When she overhears Jackie tell Gardonne that he can't be attracted to "an aging, skinny ex-con," she brings it up into their conversation many times.

The author, a Toronto resident, has written a critically acclaimed memoir Too Close to the Falls, but this is her first novel – and a fine debut it is.

The first thing one is told in a creative writing class is to write about what you know. Gildiner, a former clinical psychologist who wrote her doctoral thesis on the influence of Darwin on Freud, certainly knows this subject well. At times, the narrative gets immersed in Freudian psychobabble, but never enough to slow the pace down.

Teenager a soprano in the making

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

On the surface, Holly Morgan is just like any teenager. She goes to school, listens to alternative rock and heavy metal, and aspires to be a professional singer.

The difference is that Morgan, who just turned 19, is well on her way to realizing her ambition. But when she took the stage earlier this month at the Toronto Centre for the Arts to promote her debut CD, it wasn't rock 'n' roll she was singing – it was opera.

"Opera is so powerful to me," Morgan (her full name is Holly Morgan Schwarz) said. "It's so great to be able to create such sounds through my voice."

Her operatic voice on The Black Swan CD, a sampler released by Indigo Records, is truly amazing. She sounds years ahead of her age. The CD covers a range of styles, from the classics of Bonocini's Griselda and Pergolesi's Arietta to the Broadway opera of Lloyd Webber's Phantom of the Opera and Cats, and even the church wedding favourite, Ave Maria.

"These are songs that I really like and I have really enjoyed singing for years," she says. "We didn't go into any arias as I haven't really studied them closely enough."

Obviously, she enjoys listening to opera. Her favourite is American soprano Renée Fleming. "She's magical," Morgan says.

She says her friends aren't so sure what to make of her eclectic career choice. "I don't know if they think I'm serious about it, or if they think it's a hobby – but mostly they think it's pretty cool."

Holly Morgan, 19, is determined to succeed.

Morgan started taking piano lessons at a young age but didn't have the attention span for it. "I just didn't have the patience to practise, so my teacher suggested I try singing," she says. She's very proud of the "hidden treasure" that she found.

"I migrated to opera through my teacher who is a wonderful role model."

Her teacher, Victoria Gilbert Mendes, an examiner at the Royal Conservatory of Music, knew she was onto something when she encouraged Morgan's opera singing.

"The minute she opened her mouth and started to sing, I could see she had a lot of potential," Gilbert Mendes says. "If I gave her an aria to learn, she would listen to it many times and to many different recordings of it. She has an overwhelming desire to sing and learn."

Morgan attended Thornlea Secondary School and while continuing her musical education at the York Region Conservatory of Music, attends McMaster University in Hamilton and studies visual art.

Morgan has garnered many awards over the years, including the Music Rising Star award from the York Region Conservatory of Music in 2003 and 2004, but her age prevents her from being recognized – for now.

She says she put out the CD to see how people would react to her singing, as she's not allowed to enter some competitions because she's not yet 21. "I guess they want you to be fully mature," Morgan says. "It's kind of silly, really– how am I supposed to gain knowledge and experience?"

Morgan has lent her voice to charity CD compilations released by Indigo Records, including Showtime II, III and IV. Recently, she was one of 50 performers chosen nationally for the televised Bathroom Divas project on Bravo TV, a reality-type Canadian Opera Idol.

Morgan is determined to succeed in this world and has high expectations of herself in the next 10 years. "I'd like to say I'd be performing at the Metropolitan," she says, laughing. "For sure I'd like to be doing something in opera – something small, or maybe something big. You know [10 years] is so much time, yet so little time."

Jewish skaters vie for spots in the NHL

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

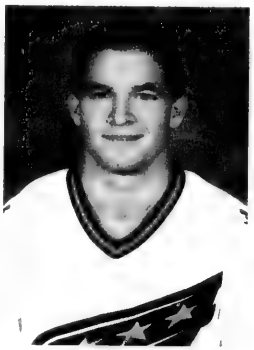
WINNIPEG — The late Beatles singer/songwriter John Lennon coined the phrase: "Life is what happens to you while you're busy making other plans."

That morsel of wisdom is particularly apt for Washington Capitals' forward Jeff Halpern, whose life took a tragic turn last winter while he was playing in Switzerland during the NHL lockout.

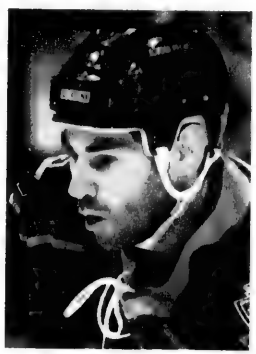
First, Jeff played for a Swiss B outfit (Ajoie) where in 15 games he scored five goals and added 12 assists. He later signed with the Kloten Flyers in the Swiss Elite League and in nine games fired seven goals and added four assists.

The Caps' star centre, an undrafted free agent who led his team in scoring during the 2003-04 campaign with 19 goals and 27 assists, was still overseas in mid-February when he received the tragic news that would change his and his father Mel's lives forever.

His mother Gloria, only 56, was killed near Coconut Creek, Fla., along with her brother Alan Klein, 52, his wife Debbie Klein, 49, and friend Anita Epstein. A fuel tanker apparently cut off her car and then flipped onto it. The impact was followed by explosions and a fire so intense that rescue crews were unable to approach the wreck for two hours.



Jeff Halpern



Mathieu Schneider

Records showed that the truck driver, who survived in fair condition, had received at least 10 traffic citations since 2002.

Gloria, who lived in Potomac, Md., was in Florida, caring for her ailing father, and the Kleins had flown in to relieve her.

It was under these dark clouds that Halpern, a Princeton University graduate and college hockey standout, began his 2005-06 hockey season with the Caps in Washington. Though he hadn't scored a goal in his first 13 games, he had six assists.

Veteran defenceman Mathieu Schneider, 36, who seems to age like a fine wine, is back on the blueline with the Detroit Red Wings. Drafted by the Montreal Canadiens in the third round (44th overall) in 1987, he has also given quality service to the Islanders, Maple Leafs, Rangers and Kings. In his last NHL season, the 5-11, 187-pound, left-handed shooting rearguard scored 14 goals and added 32 assists. Schneider, a free agent, re-signed with Detroit in the fall.

Centre Mike Cammalleri of the Los Angeles Kings has a Jewish mother (Ruth Gelbard) whose parents are Holocaust survivors.

Playing in the American Hockey League last season with the Manchester Monarchs, Cammalleri, a second round pick (49th overall) in the 2001 NHL entry draft, finished second in AHL league scoring with 109 points (46 goals, which led the league, and 63 assists.).

The University of Michigan grad is only 5-9 and weighs in at 188 pounds. But what Cammalleri, 23, lacks in size, he makes up for with smarts, as well as with stick-handling and anticipation.

While there appear to be only three Jewish skaters in the NHL at the moment, there are a handful of Jewish minor leaguers who aspire to overcome the odds and make it to the big show.

Cory Pecker, 24, is no longer in Winnipeg with the Manitoba Moose, but has signed to play in the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) with the Phoenix Roadrunners. Last year, he was with the Cincinnati Mighty Ducks of the American Hockey League (AHL) and the San Diego Gulls of the ECHL, as well as the Moose. The feisty Pecker amassed a total of six goals and nine assists in 64 games.

Toronto-born forward Eric Himelfarb, 22, is back with the Grand Rapids Griffins, Detroit's top farm team. Last season he tallied 19 goals and added 24 assists. The speedy centre is only 5-9 and 170 pounds, but he handles the rough stuff very well. In his final season of junior two years ago, he managed 107 points (37 goals, 70 assists) in 67 games.

Adam Henrich, 21, is in his second year with the AHL's Springfield Falcons. The sturdy 6-4, 238-pound left-handed power forward hails from Toronto. In his rookie pro season, he scored 10 goals and added 16 assists. The former Brampton Battalion junior was drafted in the second round (60th overall) by the Tampa Bay Lightning.

In early November, the Moose signed Jewish netminder Robert Gherson to a pro tryout. Prior to that, he was with the ECHL's Columbia Inferno, where he was 2-0-1 with a 1.96 goals against average. Playing for Quad City of the United Hockey League (UHL) last year, Gherson boasted a 2.25 GAA and was 24-12-7. The former Sarnia Sting goalie hails from Toronto. He was a Washington fifth-rounder.

Remember former New York Islanders' stalwart Bob Nystrom? Well, his son Eric was selected in the first round (10th overall) by the Calgary Flames in the 2002 draft. Young Nystrom, 22, is presently in the AHL with Omaha. The leftwinger, who is a hard-nosed two-way player, was earlier in the year called up briefly to the parent club, which considers the University of Michigan grad one of their top prospects.

Former Buffalo Sabres' draft pick Todd Simon is in the Deutsche Elite League (DEL). Last year he had 12 goals and 30 assists in Wolfsburg.

Michael Henrich, Adams brother, is also in the DEL with the Duisburg Foxes. He is a former first round pick of the Edmonton Oilers who has yet to attain his true potential.

A number of Jewish skaters have done themselves proud in U.S. college ranks. Jacob Micflikier, 21, with the New Hampshire Wildcats in Hockey East, has been described as one of the most dynamic offensive players in college hockey south of the border. The Winnipeg native, who's 5-7 and 170 pounds, scored 20 goals and added 24 assists in 42 games in his sophomore season.

Winnipegger Josh Hechter is a star forward with Saint Anselm of the NCAA's Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) and was a second-team all-star last season, in addition to being his team's top scorer with 15 goals and 31 helpers in 24 games. In one game last season, he scored one goal and added six assists.

After starring in the Manitoba Junior Hockey League with South Winnipeg Blues, forward Adam Corrin is launching his college hockey career in Anchorage, Alaska.

Oren Eizenman is a flashy forward with Rensselaer (RPI) Engineers in the ECAC league. In 27 games last season, he scored six goals and added 14 assists for 20 points.

Other names to watch for in the world of hockey are: Tyson Teplitsky (Dayton Bombers, ECHL), Aaron Brand (Port Huron Flags, UHL), Jamie Sokolsky, Greg Gardner (Bremerhaven REV), Jake Heller, David Nemirovsky (CSKA Moscow), Shawn Mamane (Youngstown Steelhounds, Central Hockey League), Myles Applebaum (Kitchener Rangers) and Max Birbraer (Long Beach Ice Dogs, ECHL).

Younger stars on the rise

ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa

When we think of Jewish celebrities, names such as Woody Allen, Mel Brooks, Billy Crystal, Jackie Mason and Gilda Radner come to mind. Even today, a good 30 to 40 years after some of these comic actors' peak performances, this iconic group – which also includes the likes of Jerry Lewis, Bette Midler and others – dominates our perceptions of Jews who have made a name for themselves in front of the camera.

More often than not, Jews in film have been funny, quirky, awkward, a little obnoxious and disproportionately neurotic. And while there is a definite sense of pride among Jewish audiences at being represented as the funniest people on Earth, there is also a cost.

When looking beyond the many comedic talents within the Jewish acting community of generations past, one comes across a catalogue of dramatic performers who were as diverse as they were numerous – Tony Curtis, Kirk Douglas, Edward G. Robinson, Harvey Keitel, Lauren Bacall and James Caan, to name but a few.

Yet, despite their lengthy careers and consistently powerful performances, these Hollywood legends have been unable to impress upon general audiences a notion of Jewish actors that doesn't immediately conjure up images of self-ridiculing wags. Regardless of how talented and even brilliant the throng of Judaic jesters might be, their antics have unfortunately tended to overshadow the wide and varied abilities of their more serious brethren.

Compared to the glut of more negative labels that have been attached to Jews in the past, a reputation for joviality should be the least of our concerns. But at the same time, the tendency of audiences to confine Jews' contribution in film and television to such a limited and limiting genre can understandably be seen as an unjust peculiarity, especially when considering the number and range of performances by dramatic Jewish actors.

The problem persists. Today, stars such as Adam Sandler, Ben Stiller and Debra Messing garner multimillion-dollar salaries and international fame by essentially perpetuating their predecessors' predilection for comedy. The style has changed, and the humour is racier, more controversial and sometimes downright shocking, but the conclusions of world audiences remain the same: Jews + Film = Funny.

Recently, however, a new breed of Jewish celebrity has started to turn heads in Hollywood. Jerusalem-born Natalie Portman tops this growing list of new faces with her notable performances in Closer and the Star Wars prequels. Rachel Weisz, who recently starred alongside Keanu Reeves in Constantine and with Ralph Fiennes in The Constant Gardner, is one of the busiest women in Hollywood. Michael Rosenbaum, who plays criminal mastermind Lex Luthor on TV's Smallville and has broken onto the big screen with roles in Poolhall Junkies and Wes Craven's Cursed, is starting to make a real name for himself. Zach Braff leads a strong cast as Dr. John "J.D." Dorian in the off-beat NBC comedy series Scrubs, but he surprised critics when he wrote, directed and starred in the successful independent film Garden State (alongside, interestingly enough, Natalie Portman).

Half-Jewish hunk Jake Gyllenhaal is hands down the newest "It" guy in Hollywood with recent credits October Sky, Donnie Darko, Moonlight Mile, Proof and the newly released Jarhead.

These are young, sexy and powerful players whose stars are shining very brightly at the moment. More importantly they, along with other equally talented peers, have the ability to reach a wide international audience. In time, some of these young stars may fade, but others will likely reach superstar status. What remains to be seen is whether this new crop of A-list Jewish celebrities will have enough star power to broaden and enhance the one-dimensional image of their predecessors.

Cinnamon Pecan Muffins

1 1/2 C flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 egg
1/4 C vegetable oil
1/2 C sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 C chopped pecans
1/2 C milk

Preheat oven to 400° F and grease 9 muffin cups. Half fill the remaining cups with water.

In a large bowl, mix the dry ingredients with a wire wisk. Mix in the pecans. In a small bowl, combine the wet ingredients. Add to the large bowl. Mix only until mixture is moistened. Fill muffin cups 1/2 full with batter. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes.

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Walter Lippmann (1889-1974), who was born in New York to German-Jewish parents, was one of the most influential journalists of the 20th century.

The column for which Lippmann became known, Today and Tomorrow, appeared in more than 200 American and foreign newspapers. He was so influential in the determination of both domestic and foreign policy in the United States that he was referred to by some as the "other State Department."

He was one of the founders of the liberal New Republic magazine in 1914.

During World War I, he was recruited by president Woodrow Wilson to help draft the document that was used to formulate the Fourteen Points the U.S. leader took to the Peace Conference at Versailles in 1919.

In 1920, Lippman joined the New York World, writing brilliant editorials. When the World folded, a victim of the Great Depression, he became a columnist at the New York Herald Tribune, to – in his words – "provide in its ample pages a little corner of mild left-wing philosophy to offset its own conservative columns."

Walter Lippmann

But the writer abandoned the left as the 1930s and '40s saw the rise of Adolf Hitler and exposure of the cruelties of Joseph Stalin's brand of communism. Despite his brilliance, Lippman lumped the Nazis, the communists and the milder socialists together, contending that "the truly liberal state does not administer the affairs of men. It administers justice among men who conduct their own affairs." In other words, Lippman condemned Big Government and favoured laissez-faire capitalism.

He wrote, in 1966: "We must remember that in time of war, what is said on the enemy's side is always propaganda and what is said on our side of the front is truth and righteousness, the cause of humanity and a crusade for peace. Is it necessary for us at the height of our power to stoop to such self-deceiving nonsense?"

Fellow journalist James Reston wrote about Lippman: "I know that he has given my generation of newspapermen a wider vision of our duty. He has shown us how to put the event of the day in its proper relationship to the history of yesterday and the dream of tomorrow."

A special Pulitzer Prize was awarded to him in 1958 hailing his abilities as a news analyst.

Nov. 11, 12, 13 etc.

URBAN WRITER

Nov. 11, Remembrance Day, has come and gone.

I have never seen war, and I don't pretend to know the reality of it, in any shape or form. Television, movies and even skilled news reports and war correspondents generally portray it cheaply, perhaps giving us a vague look at its gruesome character.

Ask an Israeli, a Holocaust survivor, a Yugoslavian or a Rwandan what war really looks like, and the truth will lie somewhere in their inability or unwillingness to explain it. It will be expressed through bowed heads, slumped shoulders and moist eyes – physical manifestations of a horror they witnessed and can never, ever escape.

Nov. 11. Poppies. Old medalled men, nowgeriatric soldiers who once dodged bullets at Normandy or other bloodied shores or countrysides, reached out to us, asking so sweetly and modestly to remember their friends, our boys, 18-year-olds, killed by the enemy – other 18-year-olds.

War, these people will tell you, is when our regular way of life is entirely erased, when rules and laws are twisted inside out, and the bullies, thugs, maniacs and psychotic people we normally lock up can become leaders manipulating havoc, using innocence as fodder for their insanity.

War and its humiliating atrocities, those who have experienced it will tell you, are so horrendous, inexcusable and unbelievable that faith in God can evaporate or evolve into internalized anger toward the Creator.

I can't possibly imagine a place so imbalanced as the world during the two world wars, nor can I imagine daily rituals and tasks that included butchering children – my God, children! – an act perpetrated by individuals who would otherwise cry during peacetime if their beloved dog died.

So on Remembrance Day, I tried to feel havoc inside of me, and outside of me; to see human beings – maybe us in another time – forced to lick the pavements of streets in Nazi-occupied Europe; to envision cities and villages razed by the most insulting and undignified inventions in history – bullets, guns, bombs, missiles and grenades, all successors to bows and arrows.

On Nov. 11, I thought about soldiers wading through muck and dirt, frightened but brave, responding to orders to secure that hill over there – which might turn the tide of reason, or change the course of history.

We know about the ones who survived, and about their experiences, because it is from them that we bought the poppies. But hundreds, thousands, millions, couldn't dodge the bullets or dive safely into the foxhole, and on Remembrance Day – in fact, every day – we must see them clearly in our mind's eye. We must, because they gave us a gift.

That gift is freedom of speech, self-determination, the liberty to learn what we choose, play where we want, dress how we like, exercise our right to criticize government and to free religious expression, not to mention democracy, capitalism, socialism, individualism and the chance to watch our children grow up.

We are grateful to you, courageous warriors, and we will always remember that you are the ones who live with the pictures in your mind of what war is really like. We are thankful for your willingness to leave your parent's home, your wife and children, your friends and community – not knowing whether that parting kiss would be your final expression of affection and love.

And to those soldiers who never returned, your legacy remains with us when we awake in the morning and when we safely close our eyes at night.

Remembrance Day, and the days after, is a time when we must realize that we are the ones who make wars, and that we are the ones who can call them off, forever and ever.

Sharon quits Likud

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A few hours after submitting his formal resignation from the Likud party he helped found, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Monday convened the first meeting of his new National Responsibility party, with 13 members of Knesset present.

Holds first meeting of new party

The new party hopes to attract 14 Likud MKs, which would grant it the status of "breakaway faction" and entitle it to some of the Likud's state funding.

"I am resigning from the party and forming a new one," the prime minister wrote in his resignation letter, Israel Radio reported several hours after Sharon asked President Moshe Katsav to dissolve the Knesset and call early elections.

Sharon was expected to hold a press conference Monday evening, during which he was to make an official announcement on his decision to leave Likud and set up a new party.

Elections are likely to be held in March.

Sharon spoke to Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz on Monday morning and asked him to show "national responsibility" by joining his new party. Sharon told Mofaz that if he joined, he would remain defence minister. Mofaz, who Sunday

Katsav makes landmark Vatican visit

By SHMUEL ROSNER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ROME — Israeli President Moshe Katsav travelled to the Vatican last Thursday for talks with Pope Benedict XVI, marking the first official visit to the Vatican by an Israeli head of state.

At the end of their 25-minute private meeting in the Pope's library, Katsav presented Benedict with framed photos of recently discovered mosaics that are believed to be from the Holy Land's oldest church.

Benedict, for his part, gave the president a framed and signed copy of the Vatican's landmark 1965 document Nostra Aetate, which revolutionized the Catholic Church's relations with Jews.

"It is a real pleasure to meet you," Katsav told the Pope as he arrived for the meeting, shaking both of Benedict's hands.

Police cleared out parked cars along the main boulevard leading to St. Peter's Square in anticipation of Katsav's arrival, which capped a visit to Italy that also included talks with top Italian officials.

Katsav said he invited the Pope to visit Israel – an invitation first extended by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a letter to the Pope in July. The president said he hoped the visit would occur in 2006, and Pope Benedict said he would like to take up the invitation.

Senior officials in the U.S. Catholic Church were said to be following the meeting between Katsav and the Pope with interest.

Katsav said he had told the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal

Sharon Protest At GA

TORONTO — Dozens of people protested Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon outside the United Jewish Communities' annual General Assembly last Monday night in Toronto. The pro-Palestinian demonstrators rallied outside the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, where thousands of delegates to the North American Jewish federation system's GA were gathered. Sharon wasn't there, but in a recorded video message from Jerusalem, he urged delegates to encourage more aliyah to Israel and expressed support for Operation Promise, a $160-million effort to help elderly Jews in the former Soviet Union and bring the remaining Falash Mora from Ethiopia to Israel.

Doc Wins Peace Award

TORONTO — Dr. Arnold Noyek, chief otolaryngologist at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital and chair of the Canadian International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), received a lifetime achievement award this month from the Canadian Society for International Health (CSIH) for CISEPO's "education and outreach programs that are increasing understanding and improving health outcomes in the Middle East." The CSIH presents the annual award to a person who has made outstanding contributions to world health and development.

Poverty Conference

OTTAWA — The year-old Association of Jewish Family and Child Agencies Canada (AJFCAC) is holding a conference titled "Jewish Poverty in Canada: A Call to Action." To be held Nov. 27 to 29 at Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation, it aims to identify "programs that work across the country" and set up "a national public education program" to be run by Jewish family agencies in Canada, Carleton University social work professor and AJFCAC chair Allan Moscovitch told the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin. WORLD

Zundel Trial Delayed

MANNHEIM, Germany — Ernst Zundel's trial in Germany on charges of incitement to hatred and Holocaust denial was postponed last week until a new defence lawyer can be found. A court in Mannheim disqualified Zundel's appointed lawyer Sylvia Stolz because her petition to the court included potentially actionable anti-Semitic statements. She also wanted extremist Horst Mahler as her co-counsel, but he is banned from working, the court said. Zundel's trial most likely won't resume until next year. Zundel, 66, left his native Germany in 1958 allegedly to avoid military service. He was deported from Canada back to Germany in March.

PETA Hits Kosherfest

NEW YORK — Animal rights activists People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals protested the practices of Iowa-based kosher slaughterer Agriprocessors last week at Kosherfest, the annual kosher fair in New York. It was part of the group's long-standing campaign against Agriprocessors, which PETA says has violated kosher standards as well as federal law by slaughtering animals through cruel and inhumane means. The U.S. Department of Agriculture is investigating the company.

Call For Applications

ALBANY, N.Y. — The Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel is taking applications for 26 spots in its five-week summer study program in Israel, funded by the Samuel Bronfman Foundation. North American Jews entering 12th grade next fall may apply. Deadline is Jan. 31. Details at www.bronfman.org.

London Mayor Defends Himself In Interview

LONDON — London mayor Ken Livingstone, an outspoken critic of Israel, defended himself against charges of anti-Semitism in an interview published last week with the online U.K. magazine SomethingJewish.

Livingstone attacked the Board of Deputies of British Jews. "The Board of Deputies – and the Jewish Chronicle [newspaper] is their mouthpiece – have this idea that anyone who's critical of Israel gets denounced as being anti-Semitic, so as a result the average spineless politician never says anything about the Middle East again. I just think this is an insult to everyone's intelligence," he said. "So yes, while there are a lot of people who hate my guts because of the position I take on the Middle East, equally there's a huge body of Jewish Londoners who have watched me for 25 years and they know it's crap to denounce me as anti-Semitic."

Livingstone, who has called Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon a war criminal and courted an Egyptian cleric who is openly anti-Zionist, said his maternal grandmother, a refugee from Czarist Russia, may have been Jewish, which would make him a Jew. "If it turned out to be true, I could go and stand for the Knesset, couldn't I? In Israel, I could be elected, no problem," he said.

New Ont. bill partially strips beit din's powers

Jewish courts will still have legal authority for rulings in commercial disputes

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Concerns that changes to Ontario's arbitration system would spell the end of legal backing for rabbinical courts in the province were allayed somewhat last week with the introduction of a bill that would remove only family law from the purview of the beit din.

Jewish community leaders say that at first blush, the much-anticipated bill seems to allow beit dins to continue hearing the bulk of their usual caseload – chiefly commercial disputes – and will result in only "minimal" changes to their workings.

In fact, community officials say the proposed legislation would still permit a beit din's non-family cases to be legally bound by the provincial Arbitration Act and thus enforceable in a secular court.

And they're not ruling out the possibility of rabbis still being able to arbitrate family disputes.

What Jewish activists are lamenting, though, is the process that led to the changes. They say they weren't consulted, and they're now calling for public hearings on the bill.

The proposed legislation came two months after Premier Dalton McGuinty's surprise announcement that he would scotch faith-based arbitration.

"There will be no religious arbitration in Ontario," McGuinty told Canadian Press on Sept. 11. "There will be one law for all Ontarians."

His move capped two years of often acrimonious debate in Ontario over a proposal from Muslim groups to set up tribunals similar to the beit din that would employ sharia, or Islamic law.

Jewish leaders and rabbis had feared the government would strip beit dins of the secular legal authority they have had since the Arbitration Act was enacted in 1991.

Attorney General Michael Bryant sounded a similar tone to McGuinty's when he announced in the legislature last week that "when it comes to family law arbitrations in this province, there is only one law for Ontario – Canadian law."

Bryant said any agreement involving family law based on religious principles would amount to "advice only… it is not enforceable. It is legally irrelevant."

Jewish officials are taking the government to task for not consulting religious groups.

"From the beginning, we were very concerned with the lack of communication between communities that are affected by this legislation and the government. That has not changed," said Mark Freiman, honorary legal counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Freiman said he hopes the government will send the bill to public hearings "to address this egregious lack of consultation."

CJC Ontario region's executive director, Steve Shulman, who attended a technical briefing on the bill last week at Queen's Park, said it looks as though only family law will be excluded from the beit din's legal purview.

Rulings in other cases involving business, landlord-tenant and private disputes will continue as before and would still be enforceable in a secular court, Shulman said.

He said there are "a lot of good things" in the bill, such as a call for the licensing of family law arbitrators and for divorcing couples to get independent legal advice before entering into an arbitration agreement.

But "what's not good is the process. Stakeholders were told after the fact, [and] we've asked for that piece of legislation be sent to committee so the lack of consultation that occurred be redressed."

The CJC, he said, will seek a balance between protecting the rights of women with their right to voluntarily submit to religious arbitration.

"I would rather run, but it is not realistic and I cannot let it ruin my life!"

Late on the night of July 6, 2004, Ofer Varfel, of the Naval Commando Marines, entered Nablus to search for a house that was known to have 4 terrorists hiding inside, including 2 commanders responsible for the cold-blooded murder of 8 Israelis.

When Ofer's unit reached the house the terrorists opened fire on Ofer and his crew. He was hit by a bullet and dropped to the ground.

Ofer remained with another injured soldier in the combat zone until he was rescued. He was rushed to the hospital with a bullet lodged between the 11th and 12th vertebrae of his spine. There was no possibility of surgery.

Ofer was paralyzed from the waist down, and confined to a wheelchair forever. His commanding officer and 4 members of this special unit were killed.

"The loss of my legs did not compare to the loss of my 5 special friends."

While recovering, people kept telling Ofer to go to Beit Halochem, and give it a try. That "try" has changed his life. "I saw that it was a place where injured people could come together to be challenged, and have a meaningful and independent existence despite disabilities and hardships."

The activities at Beit Halochem, Tel Aviv enable Ofer to 'let off some energy'. Ofer is a member of the wheelchair basketball team, swims and works out in the gym.

"I would be lost today, if I did not have Beit Halochem to help me live a normal life. Thank you for giving me and the other 50,000 Israeli Disabled Veterans a second home."

A story of war and of love

From the editor's desk

Imagine comedy stars Rick Moranis, Jerry Seinfeld or Jon Stewart completely changing professional course and writing a serious, profoundly moving, dramatic novel widely acclaimed for its artistic and literary merit that relates to the displacement and the horror of World War II.

Only then, can one understand the emphatically laudable extent of the grand achievement of David Baddiel, the author of Secret Purposes, an Abacus paperback, released this summer in Canada by the Penguin Group.

Baddiel is a comedy superstar in Britain. He began writing comedy in high school, continued at Cambridge, performed at comedy clubs, on radio and eventually became co-creator of three of the BBC's most successful comedy programs.

Even his first two novels, also well received, were comedy-centred. As such altitudes are measured, his star is in a constellation higher than most others.

In an eye-opening affirmation that talent will always find its expression if the soul leads, Secret Purposes is a further testament to the prodigious skill of David Baddiel.

David Baddiel

The CJN met with Baddiel recently for an abbreviated breakfast at a downtown hotel. The young Londoner was in Toronto to attend and to read at the International Authors Festival last month. Alas, our time was somewhat pressed as his schedule was heavily booked, for which he apologized numerous times.

Before we began our conversation, Baddiel asked if my dietary needs and sensibilities could be adequately accommodated. I was touched by his expression of concern, but not totally surprised. It was, as it were, a minor act of empathy, yet fully in sync with the themes explored in the book whose genesis and writing I had come to discuss.

Secret Purposes, Baddiel's third novel, is the story of a young Jewish refugee who, along with his wife and infant daughter, escape Germany before the war to England. After a short period of time working at menial labour in Cambridge, the young man is arrested and interned on the Isle of Man. His wife and family remain in Cambridge.

The novel traces the impact of the internment specifically, but of the war, generally, upon that refugee family.

The novel is autobiographical in the sense that it recounts the story of Baddiel's maternal grandfather.

"I wanted to write something different, something substantial, something that meant something to me. When I was a teenager, my grandfather began to tell me of his wartime experiences. The writing of the novel was a kind of continuation of that conversation."

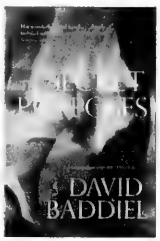
The way Baddiel explained his need to write the story actually sent a shiver up my spine.

He acknowledged that to some degree, in writing Secret Purposes, he was "responding to the current condition of Jews in England. Jews are marginalized in Britain and they are not a very particular cool margin."

But the book, I remarked, was not a "Jewish book" per se. Baddiel agreed. "Its message is universal. It is not only intended for Jewish audiences."

"The Holocaust is present in this book in its absence," he said. By this, Baddiel meant that the book contains only indirect references to the Nazi atrocities. Of course, all the characters are bound up in the degrading and debilitating shackles of the war. The Holocaust is ever present in the background of the narrative, permeating every aspect of the story, like a dark shadow creeping ever higher on an ill-lit alleyway wall.

Indeed, the last, climactic section of the book, in which all the story twists are straightened out, very deliberately ends at the gates of Auschwitz, in the year 2000, some six decades after the escape from Germany and the subsequent internment by the British.



"I could not presume to know enough to write about the Holocaust," Baddiel added, his empathy and humanity once again shining higher than the author's spotlight, which our interview had cast on him.

Secret Purposes is a love story, a war story, a story about Britain and the British, about human frailty and human strength. It is, at the same time, an exciting, moving, evocative, well-crafted novel by a skilled and insightful writer. He relied on the actual letters exchanged between his grandparents and on original source documents from British Ministry of Information.

Secret Purposes reflects on how we traverse the precarious bridges – to use Baddiel's rich metaphor – that we all find ourselves facing at one time or another across the seemingly impassable spans of life's dark and sorrowful times. It is an excellent read. – MBD

Jews join other faiths at school funding rally

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Dozens of children in Jewish day schools and many of their parents braved autumn's first blustery day last week and stood shoulder to shoulder with Muslims, Sikhs and Christians at Queen's Park to demand public funding for all Ontario faith-based schools.

As the spokespeople for the Multifaith Coalition for Equal Funding of Religious Schools put it, all they want is parity with the province's Catholic schools, which are fully funded with tax dollars, in exchange for making their schools fully accountable to the public.

Last week's rally at the legislature, consisting of a press conference inside and a small but noisy protest outside, took place on the first anniversary of a detailed funding proposal submitted by the multifaith group to Education Minister Gerard Kennedy.

The coalition says Kennedy never responded.

Organizers also noted it was the sixth anniversary of the United Nations ruling that Canada is violating international human rights law because Ontario funds Catholic education but not other faith-based schools.

The faith leaders noted that earlier this month, the UN's Human Rights Committee issued a report calling on Canada to "adopt steps to eliminate discrimination on the basis of religion in the funding of schools in Ontario."

The complainant in the UN case, Toronto Jewish parent Arieh Waldman, met last week in New York with Canada's ambassador to the world body, Alan Rock.

Waldman told The CJN the meeting lasted just 10 minutes.

"We presented him with documents, and he simply refused to acknowledge the responsibility of the federal government in this. He didn't express any worry. He said he'd pass on the documents and that we should try to meet with the foreign minister."

Waldman pointed out that Canada has assumed a leadership role at the UN in the implementation of human rights treaties around the world.

Also last week, a letter of protest was presented to federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler in Ottawa.

At Queen's Park, the coalition leaders sounded a familiar refrain, saying their children are treated as second-class citizens in Ontario.

"With the injustice of funding the Roman Catholic schools and not funding other religious schools, some children are left behind," said Archbishop Sotirios Athanassoulas, the coalition's chair and head of the Greek Orthodox Church in Canada. "We want the discrimination to end."

The coalition consists of 363 schools representing Amish, Armenian, Muslim, Jewish, Mennonite, Seventh-day Adventist and other Christian schools.

Ira Walfish, co-chair of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, pointed out that of the 750,000 children in Ontario who attend religious schools, 50,000, or seven per cent, receive no public funding.

He said Ontario is the only jurisdiction in the world that fully funds one religious education stream but not others. Other provinces, including Manitoba, Alberta and Quebec, fund faith-based schools according to various formulas.

"If Ontario will not fix this discrimination, the government of Canada has an obligation to take steps to eliminate it."

Walfish and the others stressed that their proposal for funding is for religious schools only, and not other private or independent schools.

Nirelle Blumenfeld, a grade 7 student at Netivot HaTorah Day School, told the press conference that she would like to believe a lesson she'd learned in school – that Ontario is a multicultural province.

"But my experience is that in our province, some children's education is worthy of funding and other children's isn't only because they are of a different religion."

Archbishop Sotirios estimated that funding faith-based schools in Ontario would cost about $200 million a year.

The 65-page proposal recommends that non-Catholic schools be incorporated into the larger public school system as faith-based schools.

Increased funding urged to help Jews overseas

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Harking back to the days of covert rescues and emergency fundraising drives, North American Jews are being asked to dig deep again – to the tune of $160 million over three years – to help ease the plight of Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union (FSU) and Ethiopia.

Operation Promise is the next great challenge for Jewish federations and appeals in Canada and the United States, the plenary session on international affairs was told at the recent General Assembly (GA) of United Jewish Communities (UJC).

General Assembly

There are more than 232,000 mostly elderly Jews in 3,000 cities and towns scattered across the FSU who live in "inconceivable poverty," Steve Schwager, executive vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) told delegates.

The JDC has provided them with food, medicine, home care and other aid for years. "We are their only lifeline," Schwager said.

But recent budget shortfalls have forced the agency to scale back aid to more than 100,000 Jews in the FSU, he added. Meal deliveries have been cut by nearly one-third, while more than 12,000 clients no longer receive any food assistance.

Active in 63 countries, the JDC spends two-thirds of its annual budget helping Jews in the FSU and Ethiopia.

About 125,000 destitute Holocaust survivors in the FSU receive compensation from the New York-based Claims Conference, "but they are just as poor" as those who do not, Schwager noted.

"We owe these poor, elderly Jews the right to live out their lives in dignity," he said.

Making the case for funding overseas needs has become increasingly difficult for the North American Jewish federation system, which raises money for local, national and international needs, as federations have increasingly put campaign dollars toward local social service and educational priorities.

Today, roughly 30 per cent of funds raised by North American federations go overseas, down from 50 per cent in earlier times.

But the UJC, the umbrella group of the federation system, wants to change that, starting with a new allocations system.

With the 1999 creation of the UJC – a merger of the Council of Jewish Federations, United Jewish Appeal and United Israel Appeal – came the Overseas Needs Assessment and Distribution Committee (ONAD), which comprised a cross-section of federation leaders to determine allocations overseas with the aim of increasing overseas dollars.

But while the federations' annual campaign, which tops $800 million (US), has increased by four per cent since 2000, overseas funding has dropped by more than 4.5 per cent since 2001.

Last week at the end of the GA, the UJC board of trustees voted unanimously to replace ONAD with a system that allows the system's major overseas partners, the JDC and the Jewish Agency for Israel – which runs aliyah and Zionist education worldwide – to hammer out their own agreement for the next two years. A group of federation officials will monitor the process and the UJC board must then approve the deal by the two agencies.

Some hope the new format – a modified return to pre-ONAD days, when the Jewish Agency and JDC negotiated their own funds – will restore a spirit of co-operation to the process.

Others call the resolution a compromise that will satisfy no one, and some lament the lack of minimum amounts required by federations to allocate overseas, given past shortfalls.

Ze'ev Bielski, the newly elected chairman of the Jewish Agency, told the plenary there are 100,000 Jews of Ethiopian origin in Israel who have, for the most part, integrated well.

About 22,000 Jews from Ethiopia were airlifted to Israel in two secretive missions, Operation Moses in 1984 and Operation Solomon in 1991. The estimated 20,000 left behind are mainly the so-called Falash Mora, whose ancestors were Jews but who were forcibly converted to Christianity over the past 200 years.

In October, Israel announced that Ethiopia has agreed to step up the immigration of the Falash Mora to the Jewish state. The foreign ministry estimated the country could expect 600 of the Ethiopians a month – double the previous immigration rate. Israel wants to complete the relocation of the entire community by the end of 2007.

In September, hundreds of Falash Mora held a hunger strike in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital, to protest their plight, and thousands of their brethren marched in Jerusalem last month to protest delays in plans to bring them to Israel.

Funds raised in Operation Promise have already been earmarked:

- $40 million for the initial absorption of the Falash Mora, and expansion of programs and services at absorption centres.
- $37 million to improve educational opportunities for all Ethiopians in Israel.
- $30 million for poor, elderly Jews in the FSU.
- $30 million for programs for younger Jews in the FSU who have little or no connection to Jewish life.
- $23 million for the Falash Mora still in Ethiopia, for food, rent, health care, Hebrew language education and other preparation for aliyah.

'Honest and forthright' panel concludes GA

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jewish federation leaders from across North America were politely accused of being "somewhat out of touch" with the thinking of young Jewish adults at the closing plenary of last week's General Assembly of United Jewish Communities (UJC), held at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

"I would argue that the organized Jewish community is at a critical juncture when it comes to reaching out to young Jews," said Anna Greenberg, vice-president of Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research. The author of a study on young people's religious identities, Greenberg serves on the faculty of Reboot, a New York-based non-profit organization for young Jewish adults.

UJC president Howard Rieger, who also spoke at the closing – as did Alan Baker, Israeli ambassador to Canada – referred to the current challenge of opening doors to welcome young leaders. "At the top donor level, we are aging," he said frankly, in his "call to action."

Younger Jews are looking for a way to express their Jewishness, but Jewish identity competes with other co-existing identities, said Greenberg.

Also, she said, the years from age 18 to 25 – and perhaps into the 30s, with delayed marriage being increasingly common – tend to be a low point for religious or civic participation.

For young Jews in non-Jewish areas, being Jewish may mean explaining what it means to be Jewish. "That's actually quite important," she said. "There's no reason traditional institutions can't offer alternative ways to be Jewish."

Aaron Bisman, manager of chassidic reggae singer Matisyahu and co-founder of J Dub Records, said young adults "need to feel heard, listened to and valued."

General Assembly

Bisman, who was on a four-person panel as part of the same plenary, said federation involvement is sometimes interpreted as "'How can you get me to give my money?'

"It can be about money," he said, "but it has to be about more, and you have to make space for us." People under age 40 who work with independent Jewish organizations "are the people you need," he said.

David Engel, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told The CJN that "making room at the table is something we are working on. We have a growing young leadership program.

"One of our goals is that young people who come into the system – for that matter any person who comes into the system – can not only have an entry point, but once into the system can be recognized and move through the organization.

"At this GA," he said, "there was a real movement to get younger people involved."

Bisman's co-panellist Rochelle Shoretz, founder of Sharsheret, an organization for Jewish women with breast cancer, said she did not work with the federation system initially because she "didn't have the luxury of time… Go back to your community and take this important lesson," she urged. "How many meetings does it take to get something going? Evaluate that, not because it's inefficient, but because you might be losing great opportunities."

Shoretz, who has started to collaborate with the federation, also called on delegates to open up dialogue "that doesn't start and end with funds.

"Often I'm not calling for a grant. I'm calling for advice, a cup of coffee, or help with networking with someone in another city."

"Invite [young people] in for coffee. Mentor them. Show them there are positive ways to work within the federation system."

GA co-chair Debbie Kimel told The CJN the panel was "honest and forthright.

"Certainly the youth is our future," she said. Buoyed by the energy of the annual conference, with an attendance of almost 4,000, and by Prime Minister Paul Martin's opening-night words of support for Israel and Canada's shared values, Kimel said the GA was "definitely an over-the-top experience."

On a local level, she said, it brought together more than 400 Toronto delegates and over 600 volunteers representing the spectrum of the Jewish community from seniors to youth, and haredi to Reform. As well, she added more than 3,500 people attended the pre-GA "Global Marketplace" event that was open to the public.

Engel says that feedback from American organizers and delegates show him "what a vibrant community we are."

Individual GA sessions addressed issues including Israel's and the Jewish community's self-definition after disengagement, the rising cost of Jewish life, and fostering a sense of community for a diverse Jewish population, including Jews of colour and interfaith couples.

At a panel on "Jewish community advocacy in Canada," the chairs of Canadian Jewish advocacy groups said their work is making a difference, but that there is more to be done.

Efforts made by National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) since its formation in 2002 include national leadership conferences and the hiring of 10 full-time advocacy specialists and a group of Israeli shlichim at campuses across the country, said Barbara Bank, chair of NJCL, which is a division of UIA Federations Canada.

Bank took part in the panel – which was chaired by Brent Belzberg, co-chair of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy – together with Marc Gold, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee and Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Federal elections, absurd alignments

A general federal election in the near future is now a certainty. Media reports on the weekend confirmed that Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper will trigger the collapse of the Liberal government with a non-confidence vote on Nov. 28. If the three opposition parties act according to script, the minority government will fall.

Canadians, however, should find the script deeply troubling, not because the curtain will fall on this particular Parliament. National parliaments and the democracies they uphold are constantly renewed through general elections. They are the strength that flow through all freedom-loving countries. Rather, what should gall all Canadians is that one of the actors holding the script – the Bloc Québécois – is dedicated to dismantling the very nation in whose Parliament its members sit.

Do not misunderstand. This is not a quarrel with the right of the people of Quebec to elect separatist representatives to Parliament. This is a quarrel with the federalist parties who collude with and build their plans in partnership with the Bloc.

On Sunday, Bloc leader Gilles Duceppe met with Andre Boisclair, the newly elected leader of the Parti Québécois. According to the Canadian Press, the two men "discussed separation strategy."

"We have the same fight," Duceppe reportedly said. "We want Quebec to become a sovereign country." In that pithy, uncluttered statement, the leader of the Bloc made plain the utter absurdity and unjustifiability of any alliance by the other federalist parties with his party.

It was at that same meeting where Boisclair confirmed his indifference if not contempt for the applicability of Canadian law to negotiate the terms of Quebec separation. The Clarity Act, passed by Parliament and supported by the many duly-elected non-separatist members of Parliament also from Quebec, will be ignored, he told reporters.

Thus, according to the new leader of the Parti Québécois, politics will always trump law. "I think we have to be clear on one thing – sovereignty is a political decision," Boisclair said. "It belongs to Quebecers to decide their future and it is for them to decide what kind of country and what kind of relations they want to have with the rest of Canada."

What Boisclair really means is that "it belongs to separatist Quebecers to decide their future…" Federalist Quebecers, twice in the past two decades shown to be the majority there, have already decided their future. But somehow, their political decision is less worthy and the constant target of undermining by his party and the Bloc Québécois.

The dismantling of Canada is the single purpose of the Bloc Québécois.

How can our federalist parties align with it?

25 years ago in The CJN

Canadian prime minister Pierre Trudeau embarked on a three-state visit to the Middle East, becoming the first prime minister to pay state visits to Saudi Arabia, Egypt and North Yemen. While in Cairo, Trudeau hinted at the possibility Canada might recognize the PLO as the primary representative of the Palestinian people.

PM's speech fails to deliver (1)

In your article on the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, you report that Prime Minister Paul Martin stated that Canada supports Israel's rightful place in the community of nations and pledged that Canada will push to end the annual anti-Israel politicized resolutions at the United Nations ("Martin links Canadian, Israeli values" CJN, Nov. 17). That was Sunday, Nov. 13. On Monday, a committee of the UN General Assembly adopted nine draft resolutions affecting Israel. Canada voted in favour of seven of the resolutions, voted against one and abstained on the other. I guess the prime minister's speech in Toronto failed to be delivered to our UN ambassador in New York. The prime minister stated that Israel's values are Canada's values, shared values of democracy, the rule of law and the protection of human rights. Empty rhetoric, Mr. Prime Minister.

PM's speech fails to deliver (2)

At the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities (UJC) in Toronto, Prime Minister Paul Martin said, "Canada has for many years supported Israel's rightful place in the international community, including at the United Nations. And we will continue to press for the kinds of reforms that will eliminate the politicization of the United Nations and its agencies, and in particular, the annual ritual of politicized anti-Israel resolutions."

Three days later, Canada voted in the fourth committee of the UN General Assembly on this year's ritual of nine "politicized anti-Israel resolutions." Unbelievably, Canada voted against Israel seven times, abstained once, and supported Israel only once.

Does that mean that Paul Martin lied to a Jewish assembly, or had he just forgotten to instruct his foreign minister as to the government's new direction?

Paul Martin speaks the right words to Jewish voters, but his actions consistently undermine Israel and strengthen her enemies.

The rioting in France

We are now witnessing an upheaval in France that threatens to spread to other European communities with large Muslim populations. The supporters of the rioters blame social and economic injustice for the inferno. Have the European democracies been sleeping? Who could have thought that these communities would want to be integrated into western society? On July 25, on Iranian TV Channel 1, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad praised the martyrdom of suicide bombers and said, "Islam will conquer all the mountaintops of the world." If we don't sleep in our democracy, we will not awake in their tyranny.

Claims against Austria

Since 1953, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany has been negotiating with Austrian government and industry for compensation and restitution for Jewish victims of Nazism from Austria. These efforts have produced approximately $1 billion in restitution agreements, including those described in the article "Austrian funds compensate victims of Nazis" (CJN, Nov. 10).

Compelling Austria to confront its past has not been an easy task, but the Claims Conference has always believed it vitally important to do so. The agreements of 2001 were a major breakthrough in obtaining an acknowledgement by Austria of its complicity in the Holocaust. While no amount of money can ever do justice to Jewish victims of Nazism, these negotiations were the most substantial to date with Austria and produced a thorough examination of the country's exploitation of its Jewish population from 1938 through 1945.

In addition to restituting assets, we restituted history.

The Kol Nidrei tune

As for Luigi Boccherini and Max Bruch composing the Kol Nidrei tune, I doubt that any tune of theirs could have attained such universal sanctity in Ashkenazi synagogues ("The melody of Kol Nidrei," letter, CJN, Nov. 17). According to A.Z. Idelsohn, in his seminal work Jewish Music in Its Historical Development, it was Abrahm Jacob Lichtenstein, a chazzan in Stettin, Germany, who interested Max Bruch in traditional Jewish tunes, including the Kol Nidrei. In fact, that melody had developed over centuries as folk tunes do. In the 16th century, Rabbi M. Jaffa of Prague first mentioned a set melody for the prayer, which was then written down by Ahron Beer, around 1765.

Jonathan Pollard: justice or double standards?

By JACK CHIVO

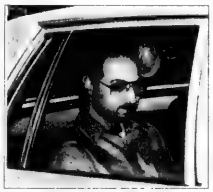
I recently had an animated e-mail debate with a retired U.S. Air Force officer about Jonathan Pollard, an American who since 1987 has been serving a life sentence in a U.S. jail for selling classified secrets to Israel. The gentleman was outraged that many Israelis protested Pollard's continuing imprisonment during recent visits to Israel by U.S. First Lady Laura Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

In my friend's opinion, Pollard is a "traitor, who should have been fried for his actions," a judgment that, to say the least, is quite harsh. I argued that, while not condoning or justifying Pollard's activities – which have done harm to American interests and Israel's image, and renewed the debate about Jewish "dual loyalty"– his punishment was harsh and unjust, and surely not in line with similar cases in which the defendants did more damage and received lighter sentences. Moreover, Pollard's sentence violated an agreed-upon deal between the defence and the prosecution that would have resulted in a shorter prison sentence in exchange for full co-operation.

Here in Canada, we have had to swallow our justified anger and live with deals made with hardened criminals such as Karla Homolka or B.C. serial killer Clifford Olson, and one wonders why an agreement on Pollard's fate was thrown into the garbage bin by a biased court in Washington.

Strangely enough, after I presented my points, the man I was debating with ceased the conversation. I hope that what follows here will shed some light into his change of heart.

I would start by repeating that what Pollard, a former U.S. Naval Intelligence officer, did was unconscionable and that he deserved an appropriate jail sentence. Using his privileged access to classified and sensitive information, he took it upon himself to provide Israel with secret data about its enemies that he thought Israel ought to know, information he thought wasn't shared with Israeli intelligence, thus endangering the security of the Jewish state.



Pollard arrested

The crux of the data passed to the Israelis had to do with then-Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's non-conventional and long-range weapons, and there are many who think that Pollard's warnings helped Israel to be better prepared when it was attacked by Iraqi missiles during the first Gulf War. Nonetheless, no matter his alleged good intentions, Pollard broke his oath to his native country, the United States, and there was no justification or good explanation for his betrayal.

Once caught in 1985, however, Pollard agreed to co-operate fully and disclose everything he knew and had done in exchange for some leniency. Yet, contrary to legal precedents and established judicial rules that are honoured even for brutal Mafia killers, after Pollard co-operated, the judge quashed the deal – based on confidential intelligence memorandums – and sentenced Pollard to the harshest possible life sentence, which was totally disproportionate to punishments dished out to other more outrageous espionage culprits.

Some argue that one reason Pollard received such unusually harsh treatment was because the FBI and CIA were unable to detect some important moles who had done immeasurable damage to both organizations, and Pollard became a convenient scapegoat to cover for their mistakes. Once the real culprits – Aldrich Ames in the CIA and Robert Hanssen in the FBI – were finally unmasked, it was too late for Pollard, and the two organizations never owned up to their roles in the Pollard affair.

There are many examples of spies being treated more leniently by U.S. courts than Pollard was.

Among the more egregious cases is Marine Sgt. Clayton Lonetree, who while stationed at the U.S. embassy in Moscow in the early 1980s, allowed KGB agents to penetrate the facility, copy documents and plant listening devices. During his interrogation in 1987, and as a condition for a more lenient sentence, Lonetree also confessed to selling top-secret documents to the Soviets.

Another prominent spy is Michael Walker, who, along with his father John and other relatives, was part of one of the most dangerous Soviet spy rings in U.S. Navy history.

While Walker and Lonetree conspired with a mortal enemy of the United States, the Soviet Union, and caused irreparable damage to their country's intelligence efforts, and even physical harm to American operatives, their sentences were mild compared to Pollard's, and they were freed after a relatively short time. Lonetree was sentenced in 1987, the same year as Pollard, to 25 years in jail, but he was freed after only nine years. Michael Walker was released after 15 years, while Pollard is still in jail.

Another Navy man, Lt.-Cmdr. Michael Schwartz (who is not Jewish), was arrested in 1995 for spying for Saudi Arabia's intelligence services. It appears that pressure from the Saudis was extremely heavy in his case, for, contrary to the prosecution's strong recommendation, he wasn't even sentenced, only dishonourably discharged from the Navy while forgoing his pension. One might assume that Riyadh made sure he did not end in the poorhouse. If only Israel had shown the same backbone and determination on Pollard's behalf as Schwartz's Saudi handlers obviously did for him.

A case that was somewhat similar to Pollard's was that of Frederick C. Hamilton, a civilian employee of the super secret Defence Intelligence Agency (DIA) who was stationed in Lima, Peru, in 1991 during a period of heightened tension between Peru and neighbouring Ecuador. In another example of what could be seen as dual loyalty, his mother being Spanish, Hamilton provided Ecuador's military attaché in Lima with classified information that compromised a highly confidential intelligence source. Hamilton was sentenced to 37 months in jail.

One of the justifications for the soft sentence – one that was conspicuously absent in Pollard's case – was that Hamilton did not help an enemy of the United States, but a friendly country, and he did so for altruistic reasons.

A bit harsher was the sentence for Steven Lalas, a U.S. State Department diplomat of Greek origin who was arrested in 1993 for supplying more than 700 highly classified documents to Greek intelligence and disclosing key U.S. sources in Greece. During his trial, it was disclosed that Lalas, like Pollard helped Greek intelligence both because of his background and for money. Unlike Pollard, however, his jail term was 14 years, not life.

There are plenty of similar examples of American spies who have acted against their country while in very sensitive positions and ended up with relatively light sentences or a slap on the wrist. The most outrageous concern FBI employees, the same people who are supposed to protect America's secrets and its civil liberties.

I will recount three of the most incredible stories.

Earl Edwin Pitts was a senior FBI agent who was arrested in Virginia in 1996 for spying for the Soviets, and later the Russians, from 1987 to 1992. He volunteered his services to the Soviets and was paid more than $224,000 (US) for his treachery. In the process, he delivered to his paymasters the names of scores of FBI "assets" inside East Bloc countries. Many were executed. Unlike Pollard, he did not receive a life sentence, but 27 years in jail, which means he will be soon eligible for parole. Unrepentant, he has declared his hate for the FBI and had said that he considers his treason payback for some wrongdoings by his superiors.

Douglas Tsou was an FBI translator who was convicted in October 1991 after it was proven that for many years he delivered top FBI secrets, including names of potential double agents, to the intelligence services of the Republic of China (Taiwan). While some of Tsou's actions were proven in court, the assessment was that they only represented the tip of the iceberg of his co-operation with Taiwanese intelligence. In spite of his proven treason, he only received 10 years in jail and is now a free man.

The most damaging espionage case in the history of the FBI was perpetrated by another senior G-man, Richard Miller, the first FBI agent ever arrested for treason, in 1984. Despite the wealth of evidence against him, and his proven relationship with two KGB operatives, one of them being his lover, his first court case ended in in a mistrial. In July 1986, he was tried again, convicted and sentenced to two consecutive life sentences in jail, but his conviction was overturned by an appeal court in 1989 on a technicality.

In 1990, Miller was sentenced a second time, this time for only 20 years, and in 1993 his conviction was upheld by an appeal court. It is hard to believe, but one year later, in 1994, his prison term was shortened to 13 years and he was released for good from prison.

In the meantime, Pollard has languished in a federal prison for 18 long years – seven of them in solitary confinement – with no appeal and no reduction of his sentence, not even a glimmer of hope.

It appears that under the U.S. judicial system, it's better to have been a spy working for the Soviets and have blood on your hands rather than a misguided Jewish man trying to help an American ally surrounded by implacable enemies.

Local groups threaten Sharon

The document, for what it's worth, seems comprehensive, carefully researched, and clearly presented.

It was produced by an umbrella group calling itself the Coalition Against Israel's War Crimes, which lists 77 different Canadian organizations as its constituents. Among them are several recognizable groups such as the Canadian Arab Federation, the Canadian Islamic Congress and Palestine House. Others have a lower profile, and likely differing philosophies and objectives – Medical Aid for Palestine, My Peace and Justice and the Robin Hood Collective, for example.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But in a rare exercise of cohesion and resourcefulness, these groups, and the many others that answered the coalition's call to action, have loudly declared their anti-Israel agenda and their readiness to engage the Canadian government in their mission. Their collective goal has been to prevent Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon from entering Canada, or to have him prosecuted if he decides to come here.

Their 17-page missive, titled "RE: Ariel Sharon: Liability For War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity Under Canadian and International Law," is addressed to Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, Immigration Minister Joe Volpe, Foreign Minister Pierre Pettigrew and Deputy Minister of Justice John Sims. However, with remarkable chutzpah, the coalition asks that Cotler "recuse himself from dealing with [the] matter" since he has "publicly voiced support and admiration for Ariel Sharon before and during Sharon's tenure as prime minister."

Also singled out is Volpe who, according to the coalition, "has made statements in support of Israel, which flagrantly contradict or ignore decisions made by Canadian courts with respect to Palestinians being persecuted by or with the knowledge of the Israeli government."

The charges against Sharon are far-ranging and invoke the Criminal Code, the Canadian War Crimes Act, and the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. The text is peppered with references to the Geneva Conventions, the "findings" of John Dugard, UN Special Rapporteur on human rights in the Palestinian territories, and reports from Amnesty International and B'Tselem.

With inflammatory language and distorted accusations, the coalition builds its case for demonizing the Israeli leader and, by association, the State of Israel itself. It is a brazen indictment that should not go unchallenged.

In the end, though, it's unlikely that our government's response to such provocation – and to the groundless criticism directed at two of its senior cabinet ministers – will be tested.

The group was ostensibly prompted by the understanding that Sharon would be attending last week's UJC General Assembly in Toronto. But since such a visit was never really expected to materialize, we are left wondering whether the coalition's efforts were no more than a trial balloon – to make its loathsome case, gauge the reaction, and use the results as a platform for future mischief.

Jerusalem YMCA embodies best of British legacy

Ironically enough, the Jerusalem YMCA is where one must turn to experience a sense of how nice things in the Jewish homeland might have been – and perhaps some day will be – under more peaceful circumstances.

Despite the institution's Christian affiliation and orientation, the language most commonly spoken between its walls in conversations among Jews, Christians, Muslims, Palestinians and Israelis is, surprisingly enough, Hebrew. It's a North American YM-YWHA or JCC director's dream. The ethnic and religious tensions and inequalities of contemporary Israeli life do not cross the threshold of the building. Affairs are conducted there in a spirit of civility and mutual respect – making it an island of refuge in a severely conflicted society.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

A near neighbour of the luxurious King David Hotel, and far superior to it architecturally, the Jerusalem YMCA is one of the finest legacies of the British Mandate period in Palestine. It is the living embodiment of the lofty aspirations, too often disregarded, that marked the early years of British rule in the land.

As Jews, we continue to harbour considerable resentment toward Great Britain for its policies during the decades of the 1930s and '40s, when the Zionist enterprise was, we feel, betrayed and abused by its former champion and sponsor. This lingering bitterness, however, blinds us to the many positive attributes and contributions of the British administration. And in all fairness, it should be noted that Mandate officials addressed their role in Jerusalem with the greatest of seriousness and dedication. As representatives of a Christian nation, they felt a special affinity and love for the Holy City.

Reflecting this sense of privilege, sacred purpose and awesome responsibility, the YMCA organization, a homegrown English foundation, planned its Jerusalem facility with the utmost care and love. To be situated on a lot directly opposite the finest hotel in the land, it was not intended to be merely one more cultural and sports facility. Instead, it was envisaged as a shining beacon of light and optimism in a strife-torn region, which through its shining example would issue a clarion call, in the biblical tradition, for universal peace. Not for nothing was the most renowned architectural firm in the world, the New York firm responsible for the design and construction of the Empire State Building, assigned to the task.

The inaugural address at its official opening in 1933, delivered by the former commander-in-chief of British military forces in the region and the conqueror of Jerusalem in World War I, Sir Edmund Allenby, set the tone:

"Here in Jerusalem, city revered by all, in the heart of Palestine, a land which has been – from remote ages till recent years – the scene of almost incessant wars, is erected an international monument of peace and brotherhood," Allenby declared. "Under its shadow, jarring sectarians may cease from wrangling, fierce passions be tamed, and men's minds be drawn to loftier ideals."

As the embodiment of that pluralistic credo of tolerance and fraternity, the Jerusalem YMCA was consciously endowed with a generous borrowing from the symbols of all three monotheistic faiths. Motifs aplenty from Judaism, Christianity and Islam grace its elegant exterior and interior. And it was not without meaning that some of its foundation stones were hewn from quarries believed to have been used in the building of the Second Temple.

Its exceptional esthetic merits aside, the facility is an outstanding representative of the British spirit of moral purpose at its finest, prior to the subsequent decline into the abysm of political intrigue and opportunism that, in the latter years, tainted the kingdom's policies. Today, as a lone outpost of repose and optimism amid the tumultuous seas of contemporary life, the YMCA continues to meet the high expectations of its founders. The atmosphere of genuine goodwill and unity, where members of all communities intermingle in a spirit of complete equality, gives reason for hope.

And as Allenby's words, engraved on the stairwell at its entrance, clearly state: "Here is a place whose atmosphere is peace, where political and religious jealousies can be forgotten, and international unity be fostered and developed."

The Mary Robinson dilemma

How should we respond to people who joined the political war against Israel and are now trying to rehabilitate themselves?

Mary Robinson is a case in point, as are Chris Patten and Terje Roed Larsen. They all played key roles in the demonization campaign between 2000 and 2004, but have since changed jobs and are now trying to repair relations with Jewish groups. Should we agree to cooperate, or should we hold them morally culpable for their past enmity?

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Mary Robinson, formerly the president of Ireland and then United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, was the first down this path. In 2004, she went to New York to join Columbia University law school's Human Rights Institute, and she has received honorary degrees at McGill University and elsewhere. This activity is reportedly part of an effort to be elected the first female secretary general of the United Nations, which would require the American and (perhaps) Canadian governments to overlook her earlier Israel bashing.

The Israel bashing began during her tenure in Ireland, where she was instrumental in pushing the European Union to provide massive support to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. Later, she presided over a UN Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) that was used as a battering ram against Israel. Robinson promoted Palestinian victimization, including the fiction the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the result of "occupation," while the UNHRC sanctioned "all available means" (meaning terror) in attacks against Israel.

She condemned Israel's efforts to save Israeli lives as "excessive and disproportionate force," falsely accusing the Israel Defence Forces of shooting at her car (the evidence showed the attack came from Palestinians). At the same time, real crimes against humanity in Sudan, Libya, China and Rwanda were being overlooked.

Ignoring warnings, Robinson led the UNHRC and the non-governmental organization (NGO) network into the UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in 2001. Its resolutions re-labelling Zionism as racism and absurdly trying to include Arabs as victims of anti-Semitism were drawn up in an earlier meeting in Tehran that excluded Israelis and Jews.

But now Robinson is trying to revise her image. She has not apologized for Durban, but admits to some excesses, and has been very vocal in condemning classical anti-Semitism. The question is whether this partial atonement is enough to accept her as a future ally.

Similar questions arise regarding Chris Patten, Britain's last governor in Hong Kong and the EU's commissioner for external relations during the Palestinian terror campaign. Patten and the EU actively promoted the myth of Palestinian victimization, falsely accused Israel of "war crimes," and poisoned the image of Israel among many Europeans. Patten also presided over huge payments to Arafat that were used for terror and corruption. He blocked an open investigation into the payments by the European Parliament, and a report by the European Anti-Fraud Office remains secret, in violation of basic democratic principles.

But, like Robinson, Patten is now trying to rehabilitate his reputation after leaving the EU. Upon his appointment as chancellor of Oxford University, he appeared before Jewish audiences, condemned the anti-Israel academic boycott and decried anti-Semitism. The standard denunciations of "Israeli occupation" that were part of his tenure at the EU have stopped.

Finally, there is the complicated case of Terje Roed-Larsen, the Norwegian official who served for many years as the UN's special envoy to the West Bank and Gaza. He was one of Arafat's most frequent visitors during the terror campaign, in contrast to Arafat's isolation by Israel and the United States. Larsen also helped promote the myth of a massacre by Israeli forces in the Jenin refugee camp in April 2002 by repeatedly referring to "horrifying and shocking" scenes in media interviews.

But before Arafat died, Larsen criticized the Palestinian leadership, and Arafat declared him persona non grata. After being appointed the UN's special envoy for Lebanon, Larsen has pressed Syria to leave Lebanon, and he has begun focusing attention on Hezbollah and Palestinian terror groups. Larsen has also been appearing before Jewish groups, who face the dilemma of whether to focus on past sins or on future co-operation.

In all three cases, the key requirement for forgiveness – unambiguous public admission of error – is absent. To deter similarly immoral behaviour in the future, it's important to demand a full accounting for past actions. At the same time, the opportunity to move cautiously toward future co-operation should be welcomed.

The Kirshner File

Israel steps up drive for ties with Muslim world

Last month, shortly after Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, the newly elected president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, issued a thundering denunciation of Israel and a blunt warning to Muslim countries not to enter into relations with the Jewish state. Describing Israel as a "disgraceful blot" that should be "wiped off the face of the Earth," he declared: "Anybody who recognizes Israel will burn in the fire of the Islamic nation's fury."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Shortly afterward, in an incendiary leaflet distributed in Gaza, the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of Fatah, the Palestinian party founded by the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, publicly endorsed Iran's call to destroy Israel.

In the face of Ahmadinejad's homicidal remarks, Arab governments were conspicuously silent. But the Palestinian Authority rejected his tirade. Saeb Erekat, one of the PA's leading officials, said, "We have recognized the state of Israel and we are pursuing a peace process with Israel. We do not accept the statements of the president of Iran." In a further rebuke of Ahmadinejad, PA Foreign Minister Nasser Qidwa said the PA will respect the decision of Arab countries that forge ties with Israel.

Despite the rantings of Ahmadinejad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Israel has established formal diplomatic relations with Arab and Muslim nations, and it is currently in the midst of attempting to establish more such relationships.

At present, Israel has full ambassadorial links with three members of the Arab League: Egypt, Jordan and Mauritania.

Israel signed a peace treaty with Egypt – the most influential and powerful Arab country – in 1979 after Anwar Sadat's historic visit to Jerusalem in 1977. Israel has had cold relations with Egypt. Cairo recalled its ambassador in Tel Aviv in 1982 after Israel's invasion of Lebanon and again in 2000 after the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising. In spite of these rows – as well as the persistence of anti-Israel animus in Egypt and the refusal of President Hosni Mubarak to visit Israel – Egypt and Israel enjoy fairly cordial relations and share two major strategic interests: to stabilize Gaza and to struggle against Islamic fundamentalist terrorism.

Israel's 1994 peace treaty with Jordan has endured – notwithstanding major policy disagreements, widespread anti-Israel sentiment in Jordan, a 1997 crisis touched off by Israel's abortive assassination attempt of a key Hamas figure in Amman, and Jordan's temporary recall of its ambassador after the eruption of the current intifadah. Jordan's pro-Western monarch, King Abdullah II, who succeeded his father King Hussein in February 1999, is committed to the treaty and has visited Israel.

Mauritania, one of the poorest nations in Africa, established diplomatic relations with Israel in 1999. The military junta that recognized Israel, led by President Maaoya Sid'Ahmed Ould Taya, was deposed last August in a coup. But the new government has not changed its basic attitude toward Israel, Mauritania's foreign minister has said.

Israel's relations with Turkey – the first Muslim country to recognize Israel and the only Muslim member of the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance (NATO) – have taken off since 1996. Israel maintains important military and economic ties with Turkey. Israeli combat pilots train in Turkish airspace, while Turkey has bought weapons and munitions from Israel, and Israel has upgraded Turkish warplanes.

The volume of Turkish-Israeli trade reached $2 billion (US) in 2004 and is expected to climb to $2.5 billion this year, excluding military sales. Tourism is thriving, with approximately 400,000 Israelis having visited Turkey last year. In the future, Turkey may be an important source of water for Israel. Relations tumbled in 2004 when Turkey's fervently Islamic prime minister, Tayyip Erdogan, labelled Israel's raids against Palestinian militants in Gaza and the West Bank as "state terrorism." Last May, while in Jerusalem, Erdogan patched up his feud with Israel. Turkey and Israel share concerns about Iran's nuclear ambitions, Iraq's descent into anarchy and Syria's meddling in Lebanon's affairs.

Prince Turki Al-Faisal

Israel also has ties with Central Asian Muslim republics in the former Soviet Union. Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan and Azerbaijan are all geographically close to Israel's arch-enemy Iran, which was friendly to Israel prior to the 1979 Islamic revolution.

As well, Israel has an embassy in Senegal – which is largely Muslim – and embassies in other African countries that are partly Muslim: Nigeria, Burkina Faso and Sierra Leone.

Israel opened a trade office in the Gulf state of Qatar in 1996, three years after the first Oslo accord was signed. Qatar closed it in 2000, when the intifadah broke out. Recently, Qatar allowed Israeli diplomats to return to Doha, its capital. Israel's deputy education minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior, was invited to Qatar last February to tour educational institutions and participate in a debate on the Arab-Israeli conflict. This past September, at the United Nations, Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom met with his Qatari counterpart, Sheik Hamad bin Jassim bin Jabor Al Thani, who saluted Israel for pulling out of Gaza and urged Arab countries to be receptive to Israel. Last month, in an unprecedented gesture, Qatar donated $6 million (US) for the construction of a sports stadium in the Israeli Arab town of Sakhnin.

Oman permitted Israel to open a commercial office in its capital, Muscat, after Oslo, but was it closed in the wake of the intifadah. The prospect that it will be reopened any time soon is dim. Oman's foreign minister has said that a renewal of relations depends on whether Israel withdraws from all the territories.

Silvan Shalom

Israel recently opened a trade office in Dubai, a member of the United Arab Emirates, a federation of seven Arab statelets. But Israeli representatives in Dubai work under the guise of non-Israeli businessmen. Abu Dhabi, one of these statelets, made an overture to Israel last summer, allowing a satellite television channel to simultaneously broadcast a documentary on the Arab-Israeli dispute with Israel's Channel 8 and the Palestine Broadcasting Corporation.

Two months ago, Bahrain – which hosts the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet – disclosed its intention to rescind its economic boycott of Israel, in line with World Trade Organization provisions and its free trade agreement with the United States. But when parliament rejected the government's unilateral decision, Bahrain's foreign minister announced that Israeli exports will not be "imposed" on its citizens, and that Bahrain is opposed to any form of normalization with Israel.

Kuwait, which played a significant role in the formation of Fatah in 1959 and is now in the process of ratifying a free trade pact with Washington, may yet drop its economic boycott of Israel. A columnist in Kuwait's official Al-Seyassah newspaper, Yousef Nasser Suweidan, has urged the government to forge a rapprochement with Israel.

Israel is also working to reopen liaison offices in Tunisia and Morocco that were closed following the eruption of the intifadah. Last winter, the Tunisian government eased travel restrictions on Israelis travelling to Tunisia. Then, Tunisia's president, Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali, invited Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to attend a United Nations conference in Tunis. In response, the Israeli foreign ministry said it regarded the invitation as a favourable signal of Tunisia's intentions toward Israel. Last week, Israel's foreign minister went to the conference in Sharon's place.

Morocco played a mediating role in Israel's early contacts with Egypt, which culminated with Sadat's visit to Jerusalem, and hosted a 1994 regional economic conference in Casablanca to which Israel was invited. Two years ago, Israel's foreign minister visited Rabat and Casablanca and met with King Mohammed VI. In early November, the president of Israel, Moshe Katsav, invited the king to Israel.

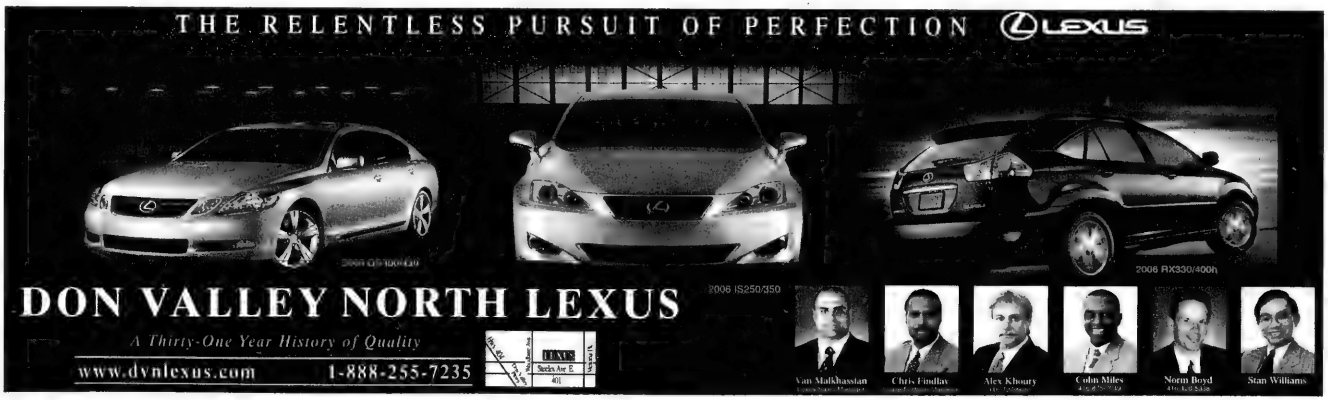
Rumours have abounded that Libya may recognize Israel, but Libyan leader Col. Moammar Gadhafi has vigorously denied them. Instead, he has called for a binational state, "Isratine," to supplant Israel.

Last week, there were two developments from Saudi Arabia. The Saudis cancelled their economic boycott against Israel, and the Saudi ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki Al-Faisal, said that his country would be willing to normalize relations with Israel once it accepts Saudi Arabia's 2002 peace plan and returns to pre-1967 borders.

The Kurdish president of Iraq, Jalal Talabani, made a similar comment in October.

In the meantime, Israel's trade with the Arab world is booming. Last year, Israel exported goods valued at $180 million (US) to Arab lands and bought products worth $82 million from the Arabs.

Of late, Israel and Pakistan have taken steps to enhance their longstanding unofficial relationship. Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, however, has indicated that full relations should not be expected until the Palestinians achieve statehood, statements that have been echoed by Indonesia (the world's most populous Muslim state), Algeria and Afghanistan.



General Assembly closes with call to action

The 74th annual General Assembly (GA) at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre sponsored by United Jewish Communities (UJC) and hosted by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto closed last week with a bold challenge from UJC President & CEO Howard Rieger. "Our call to action must be to engage the next generation and the generations to follow," he said. "The challenge is to open the door and invite Jewish young people to the table."

Rieger's declaration concluded one of the best attended GAs in recent history, with nearly 4000 delegates filling the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, November 12-15 for what has become the world's largest annual gathering of Jewish leaders.

Peter Ekstein and Debbie Kimel served as Toronto Chairs and Julia Koschitzky was the International Chair for this year's General Assembly.

The following Jewish Toronto special report illustrates the breadth and vibrancy of this year's GA.

Marketplace attracts thousands for GA kickoff

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

Officially, the GA kicked off on Sunday, November 13, but thousands of Torontonians set the General Assembly's thriving tone the night before as they packed the Global Jewish Marketplace, purchasing products from participating vendors and schmoozing the night away. It was the first time that a GA marketplace had ever been opened to the general Jewish community. And with music, food and cash registers ringing, it was a huge success. In fact, the GA's North American Chair Joseph Kanfer from Akron, Ohio called the turnout of over 3,000 people "extraordinary."

Thousands of delegates visited models of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign projects.

A Global Jewish Marketplace vendor displays her wares.

UJC officials attributed the crowds to what United Jewish Communities CEO and President Howard Rieger called the "unbelievable participation of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto" in working hard to prepare for and support the event.

Local volunteers were "practically begging" to participate in the GA, said Peter Ekstein, the GA's Toronto Co-chair with Debbie Kimel. Toronto's Julia Koschitzky was the GA's International Chair.

Great Canadian Carnival

It certainly was a unique party for thousands of GA delegates - a real carnival at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre. The carnival, which featured a working carousel, included a spirited musical performance by Toronto's own band, Bais Groove, some of T.O.'s favourite foods and plenty of other culinary surprises. The carnival committee was chaired by Paul and Karen Morton (inset photo).

Memories of Golda at the GA

Emmy Award-winning actress Valerie Harper was in Toronto last week to perform excerpts from her Broadway play Golda's Balcony during the GA international plenary. In the play, Harper, best known for her work as TV's Rhoda Morgenstern on the Mary Tyler Moore Show, plays the late former Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir.

"Extraordinary" GA showcases Toronto

UJA Federation and Jewish community host the Jewish world

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

From its conception a little more than a year ago, to its implementation last week, the 2005 General Assembly (GA), sponsored by United Jewish Communities (UJC) and hosted by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, represented a show of community support that GA North American Chair Joseph Kanfer called "extraordinary."

The community turned out in droves on Saturday night, November 12, for the Global Jewish Marketplace and, by the time, the GA officially kicked off on November 13, over 600 Jewish Toronto volunteers were ready to warmly greet nearly 4,000 delegates.

For three days, Toronto was the focus of the Jewish world as it played host to the world's largest annual gathering of Jewish community leaders from across North America and Israel.

Chaired by Toronto's Peter Ekstein, Debbie Kimel and Julia Koschitzky, this year's International GA Chair, the event was a highly successful celebration of Toronto's Jewish community.

Before the GA's opening plenary, Prime Minister Paul Martin along with UJA Federation Board Chair David Engel and UJC Chair Robert Goldberg, signed a memorial book honouring former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was remembered around the world last week on the anniversary of his assassination ten years ago.

"You showed us the way to peace," Martin wrote. "Canada will never forget."

Earlier that day, Canada's Justice Minister, Irwin Cotler, said that the Jewish people provide the world with a spiritual blueprint to wage the global struggle for human rights and social justice.

Another special guest at the GA was Elena Ralph, Miss Israel 2005, an immigrant to Israel from Kiev, Ukraine.

"Sometimes I feel that I am in a dream and that this didn't really happen to me," she said.

As you can imagine, preparing for an event of this magnitude takes time, patience, cooperation and plenty of planning.

"Planning for this extraordinary event in earnest began after several of us attended the GA in Cleveland, and we immediately began to conceptualize just what Toronto's GA would be like," said Engel. "We had set pretty lofty goals for everyone involved and not only were those goals met, they were exceeded. All of our achievements can be directly attributed to our incredible volunteers and UJA Federation staff."

"I was so proud and honoured to have served as the International Chair," said Julia Koschitzky. "We proved once again to the entire Jewish world that Toronto is blessed with extraordinary caring and committed leaders."

"I felt extremely honoured to have been given this opportunity to represent our community. Right now, Toronto's Jewish community is the envy of the Jewish world,"noted Peter Ekstein.

For Ekstein's Co-chair, Debbie Kimel, the entire GA experience was a heady one. "It was definitely over-the-top, and somewhat surreal, and one that I would never trade for anything," she said.

"I was at the GA from the opening of the Global Jewish Marketplace, right through until the closing plenary and I have to say it was an absolutely fantastic experience," said Debbie Starr, who had two of her four children in tow. "I can't imagine how much work an event of this magnitude must take, but however they did it, they pulled it off perfectly. This whole event was a real credit to Jewish Toronto."

"Absolutely," echoed Nancy Klein, who was especially enthusiastic about the Great Canadian Carnival, held on Sunday evening, and chaired by Paul and Karen Morton. "The whole GA made me so proud to be a Jewish woman living in Toronto," said Klein.

2003 invasion of Iraq praised

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Prominent political critic and journalist Christopher Hitchens praised the United States and its allies last week for having unseated the Baathist government in Iraq and for trying to bring democracy to the Middle East.

Hitchens, a former Trotskyite who now aligns himself with neo-conservative thinkers, said that Washington placed itself on the "right side of history" by invading Iraq in 2003.

"Democracy in the Arab world begins with the liberation of Iraq," he declared, delivering the second Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture at Holy Blossom Temple.

Hitchens, a British national who lives in Washington, D.C., lavished praise on neo-conservatives in the current Bush administration for having had the courage to overthrow Saddam Hussein's regime while not being entirely certain what the consequences might be.

But he insisted that his admiration of these figures, from former U.S. deputy secretary of defence Paul Wolfowitz on down, was not akin to adopting a conservative position.

He further suggested that the "stability" Saddam and his cohorts imposed on Iraq was worthless.

By contrast, Hitchens attacked old-line American conservatives such as former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft and former secretary of state Henry Kissinger, who were either lukewarm toward or against the invasion of Iraq because they preferred the status quo to prevail in the region.

He was particularly scathing about Pat Buchanan, the conservative newspaper columnist who criticized the war. In a reference to the "Pat Buchanan crowd," he asserted, "They hate me and I hate them back."

But Hitchens, whose politics have drifted decidedly rightward since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States, was critical of Washington for having supplied Iraq and Iran with military hardware during the 1980-1989 Iran-Iraq War.

Hitchens, who claimed he is neither a conservative nor a Marxist, said that the tide of history is running against one-man rule and sharia-based governments in the Mideast, but he did not elaborate.

But he did add, "Suicide bombers and Islamists who want to restore the caliphate will lose."

Hitchens, who is of partial Jewish ancestry, said he disagrees with those who argued that the Arab-Israeli conflict should have been resolved before the United States committed itself to regime change in Baghdad.

He warned that, in the short run, the creation of a Palestinian state will not dampen jihadist terrorism.

In a passing comment on the Kurds, he bewailed the fact they are the largest minority in the Mideast without a state of their own.

In a remark on anti-Semitism, he said that it is not only a threat to Jews but to Western civilization as well.

He warned that concessions do not appease anti-Semites.

Hitchens was introduced by his friend David Frum, a conservative National Post columnist and author.

Mideast stories move beyond Israel and conflict

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

There have been two significant trends in recent reporting from the Middle East. Stories from the broader region have taken some of the intense media scrutiny away from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. And in the stories from Israel, reporters are starting to file human-interest features that are unrelated to the conflict.

While the Iran-Iraq war (1980-1988) and the 1991 Gulf War attracted media attention, it was not until the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq that the media began covering the entire Mideast in earnest.

Now, instead of focusing almost exclusively on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, reporters are just as likely to investigate Iran's growing nuclear ambitions, the spread of terrorism throughout the region and the shock waves it's causing in countries that have recently been victimized (as in Jordan's case), or Syria's role in the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri and the subsequent clamouring for democracy in Lebanon.

American efforts to promote democracy in the region have led to a greater examination of the prospects for real change in the Arab world, where governments are characterized by tyranny, autocracy and repression. This month, the New York Times has been running an in-depth series on the topic, with features such as "Heavy hand of the secret police impeding reform in Arab world" by Neil MacFarquhar (Nov. 14).

The second trend – to more human-interest reporting from Israel – is due in large part to the recent drop in violence and terrorism there, which naturally results in fewer conflict-driven stories. However, there is also a growing recognition that Israel is home to many newsworthy developments in the arts, science, technology, archeology, and so forth, which deserve attention.

For example, in the Globe and Mail's Nov. 8 Review section, Orly Halpern wrote about Canadian novelist Yan Martel, the well-known author of the Booker prize-winning Life of Pi. Martel, who is not Jewish, recently spent several weeks in Israel researching a novel based on the Holocaust.

Halpern described a scene at a popular Jerusalem bookstore-café where Martel read from a draft of his new work: "An eclectic group of religious Jews wearing skullcaps and long beards, bohemian secular Israelis wearing colourful cotton clothes, native English-speakers and native Hebrew speakers, filled the stone-walled room… The café was packed with many clutching their copies of Life of Pi in Hebrew or English."

An important Israeli archeological discovery was the subject of "Researcher says find is evidence of biblical Goliath" by Reuters reporter Allyn Fisher-Ilan (Nov. 14, Globe and Mail). The reporter interviewed Aren Maeir, head of Bar-Ilan University's archeology department, about the "ground-breaking find" – a pottery shard that provided evidence of the biblical giant Goliath.

Another recent Israeli archeological discovery that received widespread media was a mosaic floor from an early Christian church, which was uncovered during the excavation of a prison near Megiddo.

In a Nov. 6 CTV newscast, anchor Sandie Rinaldo had this introduction to the story: "In Israel, a fascinating find has the archeological world buzzing with excitement tonight: what could very well be the oldest Christian church ever discovered in the land where Jesus was born."

Reporter Janis Mackey Frayer filled in the details. The mosaics, which were uncovered by the prisoners themselves, include the figures of two fish, "the known symbol of Christ."

Frayer interviewed Israeli archeologist Yardena Alexandre, who said: "It's an extremely important find because it reveals another stage in the development of Christianity."

Frayer went on to explain that Megiddo is believed to be the site of Armageddon, "the New Testament's last battle between good and evil."

These archeological finds, which relate to the Bible and thus to the origins of much of Western civilization, are compelling for both Christians and Jews. The stories also help explain the fascination Israel holds – beyond the interest in the current conflict – for so many people around the world.

Democratization: Is It For Real?

Democratization of previously undemocratic or tyrannical societies is an idea in the air and an emerging reality in places on the ground. For some, this phenomenon is revolutionary and important; for others, democratization is American hubris at its worst. This series, featuring some of the most compelling voices of our time, examines this explosive and significant issue.

Good teaching may be uncomfortable

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

In his fine memoir titled Teacher, Mark Edmundson recounts how he was heading toward a dead-end future in his working class hometown in Massachusetts until he was touched by a teacher who made all the difference in his life.

One of Edmundson's more important observations has to do with what he calls the myth of the great teacher – infinitely kind and benevolent, he loves his students almost more than he loves himself. Such teachers, in the Mr. Chips-Robin Williams model, capture the public imagination with their mixture of dedication and sweetness, with a dash of safe rebellion thrown in for good measure.

But Edmundson, who from unpromising beginnings went on to a distinguished career as a professor of English at the University of Virginia, argues that there is another type of teacher, one who may be far less appreciated when we're in school but in the long run proves to be just as important as the mythical, all-benevolent kind.

Not always the bearer of sweetness and light, this other kind of teacher is not necessarily a student's friend or confessor. He or she may, at times, antagonize the student, and even create discomfort. But in the words of Ralph Waldo Emerson, sometimes the best another can provide us with is not so much tuition as strong provocation.

Of course, a hybrid of all of these qualities in one teacher would be desirable, but Edmundson's remarks lead us to focus on a fundamental dimension of education, and on how Judaism is communicated to students.

Comfort may be a yearned-for state amid the stresses of Western living, but it's the enemy of real learning, because it works against what should be the ultimate goal of all teaching: transformation.

Good education works against comfort. It seeks to unravel buried ideas and challenge accepted dogmas. It cannot let the student rest happily if such tranquillity comes at the price of examining where the truth may lie, and whether such truth can aid in reconstructing his or her purpose and path in life.

Judaism, as has been pointed out numerous times by a variety of people, began as a revolution, from the monotheistic epiphany of Abraham in the midst of idolatrous Sumerian culture to the the countercultural bent of much of the legislation handed down at Sinai centuries later.

But all revolutions can grow stale. Customs can become rigid and even petrified, with their original rationales lost from view, or even lost from reason. How to synthesize eternal codes of conduct with the unceasing quest for knowledge is not always an easy task, but it's an imperative one. A case in point would be the ongoing dialogue, and even tension, between Torah and science – whether regarding evolutionary theory, which has captured so much attention lately (as in American court cases about the teaching of "intelligent design" in public schools), or the relationship between contemporary cosmological theory and the teachings of Genesis.

A religion that is confident within itself can uphold both faith and facts, because it embraces humility when it comes to questions that humans can speculate about but never quite solve. Science, of course, would be well advised to do the same.

Responsible action needed

By LAURA HERMAN and RACHEL KOFFMAN

Guest Voice

The world we live in is characterized by widespread conflict. Unfortunately, conflict can also be found on our own university campuses. Such conflict is not always based in fact; rather it can be caused by a misinterpretation of the goals of certain ideologies. The Middle East conflict, it appears, has recently been at the forefront, both in the world and on campus.

Last month, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad made comments that included a call to wipe Israel off the map and refuted Israel's right to exist. The statements were condemned all over the world – immediately following Ahmadinejad's speech, several countries, including Britain and the United States, as well as the United Nations, publicly stated that the message was unacceptable and had no place in world politics.

The Iranian president's comments were unexpected and considered offensive. Although Iran's perception of Israel is not unknown, the public nature and timing of the comments made them even more shocking. The delegitimization of the state is what caused an uproar across the world. Rather than commenting on specific policies of Israel, Ahmadinejad made comments that were were broad and encompassed Israel's basic right to exist.

In recent weeks, a protest was held on the Ryerson University campus questioning Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's right to enter Canada for the annual General Assembly of United Jewish Communities. The organizers based their protest on their claim that Sharon had been a leader in war crimes in Lebanon in 1982.

It is the act of delegitimizing a leader or a state that we take issue with. Since Israel's leader is democratically elected, delegitimizing the leader is an extension of delegitimizing the country. This applies not only to Israel, but also to other countries in the world.

The delegitimization of Israel caused alarm worldwide, and this is precisely why the Iranian prime minister's comments were so strongly condemned. Why didn't the call to prohibit Sharon's entry to Canada receive the same strong response on campus and throughout the community?

This is an issue that we can relate to, not just through public media but also on our own university campuses. Several groups protesting Sharon's visit have a strong base on campus. They have published pamphlets rallying support for their cause and have organized meetings to promote this protest. It is likely that many readers of The CJN have seen their posters, yet few have taken the time to think about their distribution and use on campus.

Student groups have the right to protest. We would not want to deny anyone the right to freedom of speech and expression. However, these protests are not helping to bring peace. Rather, they delegitimize a head of state and, by extension, the state itself.

This behaviour, be it by student groups on our campus, Palestinians in the Middle East or Iran's head of government, will not work towards peace. Instead it increases polarization on campus and in the Middle East. We just hope the protesters realize the impact of their actions and are willing to take full responsibility.

Laura Herman and Rachel Koffman are co-chairs of Israel affairs at University of Toronto Hillel.

Observant Jews and less-observant relatives

What Do You Mean; You Can't Eat in My Home? A Guide to How Newly Observant Jews and Their Less-Observant Relatives Can Still Get Along*, by Azriela Jaffe, Schocken Books.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Here is the problem: if you are a formerly non-observant Jew who has decided to live a life of observance, one of your most difficult and trying tasks can be dealing with loved ones. How can you continue to remain an intimate part of the lives of your parents, your siblings and their families and your in-laws?

How do you answer confrontational questions such as these?

- Does God really care if I eat cheeseburgers?
- Why can't women be ordained as rabbis?
- Why can't women be included in a minyan?
- Why can't you come to your sister's wedding?
- What do you mean you are getting married?; you've just met each other?
- Why do women have to sit behind a mechitzah in the synagogue?
- Why can't I answer the phone on Saturday and the Jewish holidays?
- Why can't you come with us to the beach anymore?
- How can your son choose to attend a yeshiva and postpone going to university?

In answering these and similar questions, the author attempts to do two things: first, explain the Orthodox or traditional reasons behind the behaviour of the pious, and secondly, tell how to achieve workable and sensible relations in order to maintain harmonious family relationships.

Jaffe is firm in her beliefs but not judgmental. She presents a helpful and practical approach to mutual understanding and offers suggestions for defusing tensions.

In effect, this relatively brief and accessible work is a popular handbook on Orthodox doctrine and practice. She explains that along with giving us the Torah, which was written down by Moses, God explained passages that were purposely left ambiguous in the Torah's text, as well as providing additional laws, some of which can be derived from the text and some of which are not derivable from the text. These thousands of laws were meant to be transmitted orally from generation to generation.

In addition, "For observant Jews, the laws of the Talmud are as binding as the laws in the Torah. They represent God's commentary on His Torah…"

Observant Jews believe that "they are divinely ordained laws that must be followed precisely as written."

In answer to questions about the seeming lack of equality for women, the author points out that in traditional Jewish law and custom, the woman is the primary caregiver in the family. Therefore, according to the Mishnah, she is exempt from any religious requirement that would get in the way of taking care of her children properly. (A woman who is, for whatever reason, not a caregiver is also exempt from time-bound commandments.)

Women, the author indicates, cannot lead a prayer service or chant from the Torah because these and similar actions are not regarded as "modest behaviour."

In the book's introduction, Jaffe confides that "if her book helps to create better understanding in even one family, it has been worth the effort. To my parents and siblings' credit, and to the credit of parents and siblings of newly observant Jews throughout the world, we are all learning how to be together as a family, despite the separateness we maintain in certain areas, It is not only possible, but it can be beautiful. We are all Jews, and we are family. We must never forget that."

Football and the Jews

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Canadians are gearing up for this Sunday's Grey Cup, Canada's largest annual professional sporting event. As the country's best football teams prepare for Vancouver, let's take a few moments to look at the Jewish contributions to the game on both sides of the border.

But first, a bit of Torah. A good rabbi is able to look at practically any phenomenon and teach a Torah lesson from it. Simcha Barnett and Eric Coopersmith must be a couple of good rabbis because of the lesson learned from the New England Patriots' surprise win over the heavily favoured St. Louis Rams in Super Bowl XXXVI.

"Throughout the entire season, the Patriots' players refused to be introduced individually, as is traditionally done at the start of NFL games. Even fines from the league office could not deter their statement that the whole is greater than the sum of its parts. In the process, the Patriots discovered perhaps the greatest human tool: the power of unity."

The rabbis continue with examples of how united Jews have excelled, whether they were receiving the Torah at Sinai, fighting in the Six Day War or struggling on behalf of Soviet Jewry. And then the rabbis conclude that "the most memorable moments in sports are those where the talents of individuals fuse into the almost mystical indivisibility of the whole, as the harmonious interplay leaves us awed and lifted." [http://tinyurl.com/buwrl]

The Patriots went on to make history by winning two of the next three Super Bowls under the leadership of owner Robert Kraft. Shortly after this year's win, Kraft was in Israel to attend the unveiling of the newly refurbished Kraft Family Stadium, donated to the local league, American Touch Football in Israel. As Kraft said, "My mother and father would've been proud of our Super Bowl wins, but much more of the work we've done in Israel." [http://tinyurl.com/crs9d]

Back on this side of the border, Howard Sokolowski and David Cynamon have been credited with breathing new life into their Toronto Argonauts, as well as being very active in the Jewish community. [www.cjnews.com/viewarticle.asp?id=1951]

After retiring – and particularly after the birth of his daughter – Veingrad felt himself drawn to his Jewish roots and traditional observance. [http://tinyurl.com/axo7w]

But have these nice Jewish boys – and girls [http://tinyurl.com/9enml] – been breaking a Torah prohibition by enjoying their game while tossing around a football made from pigskin? Principal thought waitress would make a 'fine teacher'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dana Ross was nervous on her first day teaching at Adath Israel Congregational School two years ago.

A divorced mother with no related experience, she'd been working as a waitress for about three years – and she still does. But a friend of hers who taught at the school had a hunch that Ross' people skills would transfer well to a classroom setting.

Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum, the school principal, recognized Ross' potential when he interviewed her.

"They are our teachers..."

"I could see immediately that she had warmth, a strong personality, and enough of a [Jewish] background for us to give her a shot. She had a sense of how to relate to children and parents, by virtue of being a mother, as well."

His feeling that she would make "a very fine teacher" was confirmed once she took over a class of 19 Grade 4 students.

"As soon as she got into the classroom, she [created] a dynamic. She had complete control – strength but warmth with the students, and good communications with the parents."

Instinctively, Ross wanted to teach in the most articulate and creative way possible. Colleagues and the principal provided guidance to help her get started, and she researched on her own to fill in gaps in her knowledge.

"I definitely had to educate myself," she said.

In her second year, teaching the same class of 19 youngsters, Ross introduced the weekly Torah portion and Jewish-related current events into her curriculum, after consulting with the principal.

"It just flowed. I loved it," she said in an interview over coffee at United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, where she has worked for almost five years and has an evident rapport with co-workers and her employers.

This year, at the cantor's suggestion and with a scholarship from the synagogue, Ross is studying at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education's Midrasha L'Morim to get formal teaching credentials.

Ross, now 33, immigrated to Canada from her native Israel with her brother, two sisters and her parents, both of whom are from the former Soviet Union, when she was 14.

She attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, but it was a rocky transition. Facing cultural differences and handicapped by limited English, she felt like an outsider among the tightly knit group of students, many of whom had been together since kindergarten.

Within a couple of years she left for public school, and married at age 18, as soon as she graduated. Her son was born a year later, and she divorced at 22.

Dana Ross [Frances Kraft photo]

It "haunted" her that she hadn't completed her education, and after several years, she decided it was time to go back to school. She entered Ryerson University's gerontology program as a mature student, but didn't complete the course. Financial constraints were one factor, but she found herself reassessing whether she was in the right field after a resident died at a nursing home where she was working. "I took it really hard," she said.

It was at that point that a friend suggested she apply to work at United Bakers. At the time, Ross had no other job prospects. She made up her mind that if she was going to be a waitress, she was going to "do it right," despite potential awkwardness serving a clientele that was likely to include former classmates.

While she has enjoyed the family atmosphere at the restaurant, it didn't fill the "void" she felt from not having completed her education.

A lesson from the teacher: "Every person you meet is either a teacher or a student in your life. Just because I am a teacher doesn't mean I won't learn from a student. I learn a lot from them."

Now the different pieces of her life are falling into place as she juggles motherhood, teaching, waitressing and her studies.

Kirshblum said that Ross' work at the restaurant, "if anything, is a lesson" for her students, some of whom have eaten there with their families. "She works there with the same devotion, sensitivity and warmth as in the classroom."

Operation: Last Chance uncovers Nazi suspects

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

On Nov. 8, 1944, a Hungarian teenager, Peter Balasz, was riding the streetcar in Budapest when a man in a military uniform grabbed him and pulled him off the tram.

The soldier, an old acquaintance from his youth, had noticed Balasz was not wearing the yellow star required of Jews. He knew Balasz was Jewish and given that the country was being run by the rabidly anti-Semitic Arrow Cross, "it was open season on Jews," said Nazi hunter Efraim Zuroff.

Zuroff, director of the Jerusalem office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, was in Toronto recently to address a Kristallnacht commemoration at Congregation Habonim as part of Holocaust Education Week and to discuss war-crimes issues with students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Wilmington and Richmond Hill campuses.

Zuroff said the soldier, Karoly (Charles) Zentai, took Balasz to the military barracks at Arenautca 51, where he and two accomplices beat the teen to death.

From there, they dumped his body in the Danube River, which had been dubbed the "Red Danube" because of the blood of the thousands of Jewish victims who were thrown into the historic waterway.

Zentai's name and his deed have resurfaced in recent years and prompted investigations in both Hungary and Australia, where Zentai fled after the war.

An Australian court has granted Hungary's request for extradition, and in about three months, a second Australian court will consider Zentai's appeal of the removal order.

Zuroff said the Zentai case is one of the successes of Operation: Last Chance (OLC), a program initiated by the Simon Wiesenthal Center and Targum Shlishi, a Florida philanthropic organization, to uncover Nazi-era war criminals.

OLC has been launched in nine European countries to bring Nazi perpetrators to justice, educate the public about the Holocaust and combat anti-Semitism.

The information that led to Zentai's extradition request came from Balasz's brother, Adam, who uncovered it after going through his late father's papers. Deszo Balasz had gathered evidence from the post-war trial of Zentai's accomplices, and in 1947, he had presented it to the Hungarian government. By that time, Zentai had fled to the American zone in Germany and from there he moved to Australia.

Information about Zentai was passed to the Australian media, who found him in Willeton, a suburb of Perth. They filmed the octogenarian in apparent good health, leaving his home and driving a car. Now, as part of his defence, he claims he's in poor health, a tactic employed by other war-crime suspects, Zuroff said.

A second important war criminal revealed through OLC is Aribert Heim, a doctor who tortured and killed inmates at the Buchenwald and Mauthausen concentration camps.

In his two months of service at Mauthausen in 1941, Heim murdered hundreds of prisoners. "He was a real sadist. He injected phenol into inmates to see how they would die," Zuroff said.

After the war, he returned to Germany from his wartime posting in Finland and worked as a gynecologist in Baden-Baden. In 1962, he was about to face trial, but "he disappeared into thin air," Zuroff said.

About a year ago, Heim was tracked to Spain, thanks to a misstep by one of his children, who was involved in questionable financial practices that led to a police investigation. Police learned the family sent cheques worth $400,000 to Heim in Spain in 2001 and 2003 and that a bank account was being maintained in his name.

Police in Bad Wurtemburg set up a task force to investigate Heim and the Simon Wiesenthal Center co-operated by naming him as part of OLC. "We've gotten a flood of possible sightings of the guy in Spain," Zuroff said.

"If [Heim] is caught, it will be the most important high-profile Nazi war-crime trial in 30 years," Zuroff said, pointing to his "misuse of medicine and perversion of science."

Zuroff noted that under OLC, one suspect has been indicted "and at least another should be charged in the very near future. Seventy-nine names have been submitted to prosecutors and dozens of additional names, received primarily from Germany, are currently under investigation."

The Wiesenthal Center's annual status report, Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals, published in August, gives Canada a grade of "C" for its efforts.

Not a single suspect has been deported among the eight successful denaturalization cases, while two others left voluntarily and six others died during proceedings, the report noted.

But Zuroff was even more pointed in his critique.

"It's a total travesty," he said. "It's an outrage what's going on here. The overall picture is [one of] failure, especially considering the switch to deportation route [from criminal prosecutions]."

The United States, which adopted a similar removal system, has registered more than 100 successes, while Canada can't even remove the individuals who have lost in court.

"It's a national disgrace.

"Canada allows these defendants to abuse the system and prevent their punishment," he said.

Early on, the United States streamlined its removal system to prevent abuse. The Canadian removal system is badly flawed.

"It's built into the system. The system defeats itself," he said.

The article "Sheba Medical Centre a leader in field of rehab," (CJN, Nov. 10) contained incorrect information. The Sheba Medical Center is the largest medical centre in Israel, with 90 departments and more than 900 doctors. The centre's Rehabilitation Hospital has five departments. The CJN regrets the error.

Concert to benefit damaged New Orleans shul

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Congregation Habonim will open its doors on Saturday, Dec. 3, for a benefit concert to aid a New Orleans synagogue that was severely damaged by the flooding that followed Hurricane Katrina.

Congregation Beth Israel, an Orthodox shul with 200 member families, is located only a few blocks from Lake Pontchartrain, the large body of water that marks New Orleans' northern border. The lake overwhelmed restraining levees and badly damaged much of the city. The synagogue was in one of the worst-hit neighbourhoods.

Burt Serfaty, who is organizing the concert, said he looked into the plight of the Louisiana Jewish community following the hurricane, and "from the research I did, it seemed like [Congregation Beth Israel] was the worst hit. All the Torahs apparently were destroyed. It seems they are in desperation."

Nevertheless, Congregation Beth Israel, which offers the only regular daily minyan in New Orleans, plans to rebuild.

Virtually 100 per cent of the money raised at the concert will be sent to New Orleans to aid in that effort. Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, is co-sponsoring the concert and will channel all funds raised to New Orleans, Serfaty said.

Three performers will headline the show: David Nefesh, a Detroit singer/songwriter in the folk/rock milieu; contemporary folk singer/songwriter Kim Doron; and Deekaye Ibomeka, a Nigerian-born jazz and soul singer.

The "One World, One Love" concert starts at 8:30 p.m at Congregation Habonim, 5 Glen Park Ave. Tickets are $20 each. For more information, call 416-636-5385 or e-mail concert4bethisrael@sympatico.ca.

Beit din hears few divorce matters

Because the proposed legislations stipulates that family-law arbitrations must be based on Canadian or Ontario law in order for their rulings to be enforced, the nature of the beit din's decisions, and possibly its procedures, will have to change, Shulman noted.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary of the Toronto Vaad Harabonim's beit din, agreed that the "vast majority of cases will still have the force of law." The beit din will be "minimally affected" by the proposed changes.

The Toronto beit din hears 25 or 30 cases a year involving commercial, business and labour disputes, but only two or three annually on matters arising from divorce, such as division of assets and child custody, Rabbi Tradburks said.

He stressed that any changes will not affect the granting of gets, or Jewish divorce decrees.

He said litigants will still be free to go to a beit din on family disputes if both parties consent. But if the government's amendments are enacted, divorcing couples could end up in secular courts appealing beit din decisions they didn't like, or ignoring them altogether.

The CJC's Freiman said the regulations will have to be studied in greater detail, but he's not ruling out the possibility of a beit din still ruling on family disputes.

"It could be that [rabbis] will have to become members of a recognized arbitrative association, or complete courses in Canadian law."

What worries Rabbi Tradburks are the "much broader implications" of the government's actions.

"Because sharia was at odds with modern values, they took it out on the Jews. What other confrontations will occur? This could be the beginning of a backtracking on freedoms.

"I don't want to be alarmist," he said. "But will the government's clampdown on religious freedoms put a crimp on Jewish freedoms as well?"

School funding rally

They would be accountable to the government, the public, parents and be required to meet provincial standards, Walfish told reporters.

Other aspects of the proposal include:

• Each school would have to comply with the government's approved curriculum and use standardized tests.

• Teachers would be certified.

• Schools would be subject to inspection, and would have to provide audited financial statements.

"We are also proposing that participating schools be required to affirm that certain things would not be taught," Walfish said, "particularly doctrines of racial or ethnic superiority, religious intolerance, social change through violent actions or disobedience of laws."

The activists noted that while the Supreme Court of Canada ruled in 1996 that Ontario's funding of Catholic schools but not other faith-based schools was legal, the court did not prevent the province from funding non-Catholic education.

"Parents take out second mortgages to afford school for their children. For most parents, school tuition is the single highest expenditure in their family budget. This is unacceptable."

Kennedy last week scotched hopes that the province would fund non-Catholic schools.

"Our focus is on publicly funded schools," he told Canadian Press. "There's a choice for every family to put their kids in publicly funded education because it is of high quality, it is safe and it is going to deliver what their student needs."

He added that "no one should be surprised" by the Liberals' cancellation of the Tories' Equity in Education Tax Credit because they "campaigned on a promise to do just that.

"The previous government put forward a really ill-considered school tax credit that was available to anyone who set up a school with as little as five kids," he said. "There were no standards, and it would have eventually cost over $500 million."

בין פרס לפרץ

"גם אילו התמדד על ראשות ועד הבית של מגדלור בודד, שהוא דיירו היחיד, היה שמעון פרס מפסיד על חודו של 0.6

Northern Country

שגרירנו בקנדה

WHAT MAKES A GREAT SCHOOL GREAT?

great leadership

Associated Hebrew Schools announces that Rabbi Pinchas Tessler, our Principal of Judaic Studies at the Kamin Education Centre, will be retiring effective June 30, 2006.

Rabbi Tessler has served Associated as a Principal for 20 years and is adored and respected by students, faculty and colleagues alike. His legacy is a passionate and unwavering dedication to the Jewish education of every student. Through Rabbi Tessler's rabbinic guidance, Jewish values and practice have continued to be an integral part of the Associated experience.

Associated is delighted to announce the appointment of Ms. Kathy Friedman as Principal of Judaic Studies/Associate Principal of the Kamin Education Centre beginning August 1st, 2006.

Ms. Friedman has an outstanding reputation as a senior educator, administrative leader and teacher in the Toronto educational community. She holds degrees in education from the University of Toronto and a teaching degree from the Midrasha L'Morim of Toronto. In addition, she holds a Principal's certificate from the Day School Leadership Program at the Jewish Theological Seminary. Ms. Friedman began her educational career at Associated and having been quickly identified as a leader, coordinated many educational programmes and activities. Since 1995, she has served as a Principal of Judaic Studies and campus Principal at the United Synagogue Day School. During her educational tenure, she has emerged as an important leader in character education, Hebrew and Judaic education, programming, special needs, and early childhood education.

One of the hallmarks of great schools is great educational leadership. We celebrate Ms. Friedman's return to Associated as she takes her place in the company of great educational leaders, like Rabbi Tessler, who have made and continue to make Associated a great school.

Trudeau's Mideast documentary draws fire

By TANIA HAAS
Special to the CJN

The Trudeau name continues to draw crowds and controversy, even now in 2005.

About 180 people attended a recent screening of Alexandre (Sacha) Trudeau's 2004 documentary The Fence, a film chronicling two families – one Israeli, one Palestinian – on opposing sides of the security barrier in the Jenin-Afula area.

The film was presented by Generation Aleph, Holy Blossom's outreach program for Jewish young adults, but the room was filled to capacity with a cross-section of the general Toronto community.

Trudeau, a self-professed left-wing journalist, says he is sympathetic to the Palestinian struggle.

"The Palestinians have been deeply manipulated," said Trudeau. "They have been cornered into a game, and if pushed, they react violently. And then Israel hits twice as hard.

"While there is an exceptional violence in Israel, there is a systematic violence in Palestine. My objective was to give more humanity to Palestinians."

It was the partiality in the film that led to a lively dialogue after the screening.

Sascha Gurwitz, 26, was dismayed by the perceived bias of the film.

"I was so upset during that movie, that at one point, I was about to walk out," said Gurwitz. "He chose to film the Israeli portion in Avital, a small, relatively quiet, farming community. He didn't mention that people in Tel Aviv are scared to walk down the street. I've lived there; your bags are checked every five minutes. His film lacked any objectivity."

Although clashing in political bents, Trudeau agreed with his apparent lack of objectivity.

"I don't believe in objectivity in journalism," he said. "I don't think it is possible."

Another audience member, Steven Troster, said the film was without a balance of reporting.

"It was a very sobering film, but it did not give the full story. He said that the Palestinians have been led down the wrong path, but it did not ask the pivotal question – by whom?" Troster said.

"I think the film is a good first introduction to the issue," said Rabbi Yael Splansky, the founder of Generation Aleph.

"Tonight was an absolute success. There was a rich tension. We could have even tolerated a little more heat," said Rabbi Splansky.

Nazar Tarasenko, one of many audience members who spoke during the question period, said, "You cannot blame Israel for everything. I'm curious to know what they said on the ground in Jenin. How did they justify their squalid condition, no business, no industry?"

Trudeau equated the Palestinian cause with the plight of the Canadian aboriginal people.

Alexandre (Sacha)Trudeau, who made the documentary The Fence, a film chronicling two families – one Israeli, one Palestinian – says he doesn't believe objectivity in journalism is possible. [Heather Buchan photos]

"It's like asking [Canadian aboriginals] why haven't they developed and progressed despite their conditions? There is a slow process of restoring dignity," said Trudeau.

"The Palestinians have had very little chance to develop its own institutions. Arab leadership has a long way to go. They need help, and we should all help them."

Trudeau uses journalism as a way to reveal the common humanity of all people. For his first film, Embedded in Iraq, Trudeau lived with an Iraqi family during the 2003 invasion of Iraq by the United States.

Trudeau is currently working on a film about the Canadian system of security certificates under which suspected terrorists are detained indefinitely, without trial, based on secret evidence. Trudeau is following five specific cases.

He calls himself a shy filmmaker, choosing to immerse himself with a family for months before filming them.

It was this filming style that compelled Navin Harrilal, a video editor in Toronto, to attend the event.

"I find his filming process very profound. How he immerses himself in the process is quite admirable," he said.

Jazz at Mohawk College

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — In the McIntyre Auditorium on the campus of Mohawk College, a standing-room-only audience recently enjoyed some of the best jazz instrumentalists in the country, the Rob McConnell Tentet.

The tentet, the successor to McConnell's Boss Brass, features Don Thompson on piano, Mike Murley and Alex Dean on tenor sax, Terry Clarke on drums and McConnell on valve trombone. They bring excitement and superb musicianship to McConnell's arrangements of jazz standards.

The concert was sixth in a series of annual performances produced by Steeltown Friends of Mohawk Jazz.

Larry Paikin, a volunteer fundraiser for the Jewish National Fund and Israel Bonds, was key in the formation and success of the Friends group. Paikin is a serious student of the clarinet, and his day job is selling locomotives.

One of Paikin's pet projects was the funding of Russ Weil's Hamilton All-Star Jazz Band trips to play at the Montreux Jazz Festival in Switzerland.

In the late 1990s, Paikin was asked by Mike Malone, a member of the music faculty at Mohawk who had students in Russ Weil's band, to help raise funds for the music department at the college, which was being starved because of cutbacks to community colleges.

Paikin then put together the Steeltown Friends of Mohawk Jazz group. He called jazz lover Bob Miller and said, "You've just been elected president, [of the Friends group]," a position he still holds. Paikin also called Mel Gunn, whose skills are in graphic arts, designing and the printing of posters and programs, as well as publicity. Gunn's wife, Jan, also joined the group.

Soon Paikin and others in the group had assembled about 15 people who had the skills needed to raise funds for the college's music department.

Israel gets all party support in Parliament

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A strongly worded resolution backing Israel that passes unanimously in the House of Commons is a rare occurrence.

Yet that's just what happened on Oct. 31, when the House unequivocally endorsed a vehement denunciation of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's call to "wipe Israel off the map."

The motion, drafted by the all-party Canada-Israel Interparliamentary Friendship Group (CIIFG), said the president's recent statements "are unacceptable, promote violence, are racist and undermine any hopes of a peaceful settlement in the Arab-Israeli conflict."

It went on to urge the government to have Iran censured at the United Nations, particularly in light of its human rights record and failure to co-operate with the International Atomic Energy Agency over its nuclear program.

Marlene Jennings

Montreal-area Liberal MP Marlene Jennings, a non-Jew who has chaired the 68-member CIIFG since April and led the effort to draft the resolution in the days after the group's annual meeting last month, said with pride that this sort of support for Israel is relatively new in federal political circles.

"I seriously wonder if three or four years ago that [kind of motion] would have passed," said Jennings, MP for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce–Lachine, adding that she recalls a time in Ottawa not that long ago when "Israel was basically blackened on everything."

That's why the work of her group is considered so important.

Founded in 1981 "to work for a greater friendship and goodwill" between Israel and Canada and their respective parliamentarians, the CIIFG, which includes MPs and senators from all parties, is not to be confused with Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, which, as its name suggests, is for Liberal MPs and senators only.

Co-chaired by Winnipeg MP Anita Neville and Senator David Smith, the Liberal group came together in 2003 to improve ties between Liberal parliamentarians and Israel, and by extension, Canada's Jewish community. The group is committed to providing Canadian Jewry with a strong voice in Parliament that supports Israel.

In June of 2003, 15 Liberals co-wrote a groundbreaking critique of Canadian foreign policy that sought to warm Ottawa's relations with Jerusalem.

But Jennings points out that her group is different because it brings together parliamentarians from all four parties represented in both houses of Parliament.

Its executive is made up of seven Liberals, four Conservatives and one Bloc Quebecois MP, Richard Marceau, who is one of two vice-chairs.

As well, the friendship group is one of about a dozen recognized parliamentary associations that Canada operates with countries it shares similar characteristics with in order to promote its interests abroad. Thus, the CIIFG has "official status," meaning it has space on the Canadian government's website and other perks. It is currently exploring using the e-mail accounts of MPs and senators to distribute news and views about Israel.

It's been busy in other ways as well.

Also on Oct. 31, the CIIFG co-sponsored a roundtable on terrorism with the Canada-Israel Committee, which took place on Parliament Hill. Guest speaker was Israeli counter-terror expert Boaz Ganor. Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, was in attendance.

Earlier this month, the group hosted a breakfast for about 40 Parliament Hill staffers. The featured speaker was Aluf Benn, diplomatic editor for the Israeli daily newspaper Ha'aretz, who was in Canada on a speaking tour sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee.

The CIIFG is planning a reception with Baker and Pierre Pettigrew, Canada's foreign affairs minister.

In a press release following its AGM, the group said it will embark on a new "strategic outlook"

It has decided to improve ties with members of Israel's Knesset and with American and European elected officials, as well as to adopt "a non-partisan" approach to engage the government "in a constructive dialogue."

In the House of Commons on Nov. 4, Jennings rose to proudly note her group's vigorous agenda.

"Never before did a friendship group have the substantive goals we have set for ourselves, nor the energy that everyone felt during the session," she told fellow MPs.

"The Canada-Israel Interparliamentary Friendship Group plans on being very active… we are setting up an information service for all members to highlight Israel's scientific, cultural, social and educational achievements."

Jennings said the CIIFG's work "is actually going better than anyone expected."

In past years, many MPs were governed by the "knee-jerk [view] that Israel was only about conflict. But now, the issue of international terrorism has worked a positive effect on parliamentarians. More of them are looking at Israel and starting to say, 'Wait a minute. Maybe I should think this out more clearly.'"

Jennings rejects the argument that her group is helping to shift Canada away from its traditional neutrality and toward a pro-Israel stand.

"It's providing a platform for a fair hearing. Fairness means you look at the facts. If you're really neutral, you'll look at the facts.

"Israel is a great country and it deserves a fair hearing."

Rabin remembered as a man of peace

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A decade after his assassination, Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was remembered at a memorial ceremony as a man of peace who devoted his life to the security of the State of Israel.

Hosted by the Israeli Embassy in association with the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group and the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, the ceremony was attended by representatives of all three Canadian parties and other dignitaries.

James Lunney, the vice-chair of the Friendship Group and a Conservative member of Parliament from Nanaimo, B.C., said that "Israel and her partners for peace must not be allowed to be isolated or demonize… his [Rabin's] contribution to his nation and to the path of peace will never be forgotten, but it remains for those who follow to see real peace established and the vision realized."

Thornhill, Ont., Liberal MP Susan Kadis said she is "very proud to be part of a [political] party that supports Yitzhak Rabin's ideals."

Referring to a recent statement made by the president of Iran advocating the destruction of Israel, Kadis noted that the Canadian government had immediately condemned Iran. "No country, no leader and no citizen should stand for such words," she said.

Speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party, Halifax MP Alexa McDonough called Rabin a hero. "This was a global hero. This was a world hero. What we must always ensure is that his life was not lost in vain, that his passion, his commitment, his devotion to building a secure Israel and negotiating a lasting peace was not in vain."

La Pointe-de-l'Ile, Que., Bloc Québécois MP Francine Lalonde delivered a message in French.

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker recalled working with Rabin. "In my previous capacity as legal adviser to the various delegations that were negotiating peace with our neighbours, it was my fortune to work with Yitzhak Rabin in various capacities.

"He used to say that there are things that are far more important than just observing the strict details… you have to understand the spirit of the situation," Baker said.

Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, who sang the K'El Maleh Rachamim prayer, spoke of Rabin's legacy of peace building. "He was a soldier for peace and a soldier of peace. We have the responsibility as Mr. Rabin's spiritual heirs to continue to push for peace, to pressure those who have the ability to make peace, to do so," Rabbi Finkelstein said.

London dance program highlights Jewish resilience

By CARMI LEVY
Special to The CJN

LONDON, Ont., — Educational programs that use unique means to reach Jewish and non-Jewish youth are becoming especially critical now, says Esther Marcus, executive director of the London Jewish Federation.

"Every year reinforces the sad reality that we are losing our survivors," Marcus says. "Before we lose our last remaining witnesses to the Holocaust, we must ensure that we have the voices to continue to share the experiences, to ensure that the world never forgets."

To reach out to those too young to remember, the London Jewish Federation sponsored a series of three presentations by the Children's Dance Project, for Holocaust Awareness Week and as part of its Remembrance Day ceremonies. Titled Resilience in the Face of Trouble and Despair, the performances played to sold-out audiences of local high school students at the University of Western Ontario's Talbot Theatre and at the city's South Secondary School. More than 900 people, Jewish and non-Jewish, attended the three performances.

Marcus said the program was designed explicitly to raise the consciousness of the next generation, and it exceeded the federation's original goal of reaching out to the community's youth.

"I am impressed with how strongly the message resonated with everyone who attended," said Marcus. "We raised the issue of intolerance and started the dialogue with an audience that may not have been as aware of it beforehand. Now, they want to learn more."

The Children's Dance Project is a local troupe of young dancers who perform the works of professional choreographers for a wide range of community events. The haunting opening dance, Human Family, features 21 students who each spent some 40 hours in rehearsal. The students were from nine different high schools and many different ethnic backgrounds.

"This is the springboard to us continuing to deliver a message of empathy and tolerance to our schools," Marcus said. "We're glad we were able to reach out in this manner to help these kids learn about intolerance, and their role in stopping it."

The show was choreographed by international dance star and York University adjunct professor of dance Danny Grossman; Lorry May, longtime soloist of modern dance legend Anna Sokolow's work; and dancer Trish Armstrong, who works with students and professionals across the province to stage Grossman's work. This show marked the seventh consecutive year that London secondary school dance teacher Debra Kapp has worked under Armstrong's direction to stage Grossman's work.

The shows also featured a photographic display of Holocaust-era images by Tilsonburg high school teacher Robin Barker-James, a three-time finalist for the Governor-General's Award for excellence in the teaching of history and co-creator of the series Evil Empire: Hitler's Europe.

On behalf of the London Jewish Federation, Rachelle Frydman spoke about the universal need to build defences against hatred.

"An educated society is a more tolerant society," said Frydman, an educator at the London Community Hebrew Day School. "An ignorant society is more likely to lead people to adopt racist views about the world, its people and its problems."

Resilience in the Face of Trouble and Despair came in the wake of another high-profile community event. The "Hana's Suitcase" program, which featured Holocaust victim Hana Brady's brother, George, and Tokyo Holocaust Education and Resource Centre curator Fumiko Ishioka, was attended by more 550 people.

ISRAELIS VISIT: A delegation of 14 young Israelis who immigrated to the Jewish state from Ethiopia were treated recently to a tour of Niagara Falls by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's young adult division (YAD). Following their trip to the falls and a few Niagara wineries, they visited the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto, where they met with Hillel students. Judge rules Internet postings 'vile... threatening'

A Federal Court judge has branded Internet postings by an alleged white supremacist as "vile," "threatening" and "manifestly contrary" to the Canadian Human Rights Act.

In a ruling released on Nov. 7, Judge Yves de Montigny said blacks and Jews were the obvious targets in Internet messages by London resident Tomasz Winnicki. "There are several messages in Mr. Winnicki's postings that discriminate against persons of the Jewish faith and are in fact threatening," de Montigny stated.

Statements about blacks "are undoubtedly as vile as one can imagine and are not only discriminatory but threatening to the victims they target," he added.

The judge's comments were contained in written reasons that explained his decision last month to issue a temporary injunction. That injunction prevents Winnicki "from communicating, by means of the Internet, messages that are likely to expose persons to hatred or contempt" because of their religious, racial or national background.

The injunction applies until a Canadian Human Rights Tribunal makes a final decision in the case. Final arguments are scheduled for Dec. 12 in Toronto.

Ottawa human rights lawyer Richard Warman launched the complaint against Winnicki in September 2003, alleging the Winnicki violated the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) by posting hate messages on the Internet, mostly to U.S. white supremacist groups.

Warman alleged the postings would likely expose Jews and blacks to hatred or contempt. "The postings engaged in profanity-laced attacks alleging Jews were murderers bent on destroying Western civilization and that blacks were animals, sub-humans, criminals and should be segregated," Warman alleged.

In addition to providing reasons for his decision, de Montigny laid out the test for injunctions in cases involving Internet hate. Injunctions may be applied "where the words complained of are so manifestly contrary to section 13 of the CHRA that any finding to the contrary would be considered highly suspect by a reviewing court," the judge ruled.

Warman called the decision "a victory for human rights and upholding human dignity."

The London Free Press speculated that the Federal Court's ruling could deal a blow to Winnicki's chances before the tribunal, but Winnicki's lawyer, Chi-Kun Shi, said an earlier court decision set out the rule that the Federal Court should not express views on the merits of a case before a hearing before it took place.

Warman said he would send a copy of the Federal Court decision to London police, who are investigating Winnicki in connection with alleged violations of the hate promotions section of the Criminal Code.

Winnipeg Jewish students place third in public speaking competition

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Shira Lerner likes to express her opinions clearly.

That's why she enjoys participating in the Gray Academy of Jewish Education's public speaking program.

"Public speaking helps me develop the speaking skills I need to express opinions that matter to me," the Grade 11 student says.

Grade 12 student Susan Schipper likes the idea that you have to be prepared to debate either side of an question.

"It gives you a different perspective," she says. "It's helpful to be able to look at both sides of an issue."

Because of their skills, both students were on the Gray Academy team that participated the International Independent Schools Public Speaking Competition held in Montreal from Oct. 27 to 30. With teammate Ilana Shapera (also a Grade 12 student), they placed third among Canadian teams and seventh out of 57 teams in the competition.

Teams came from across Canada and the United States, as well as from Australia, Scotland, England, Bermuda and Cyprus.

In addition to the team's being in the top 10, Lerner placed fourth in the individual debate category and Shapera placed fifth in dramatic interpretation. As one of the top Canadian competitors, Schipper will represent Canada at the World Individual Debate and Public Speaking Competition at Hotchkiss School in Connecticut in March 2006. This will be her second consecutive year in the world competition, which was held in Cyprus last year.

"I am impressed with the debating talent I have seen at the international level," Schipper says, "particularly among those debaters who come from countries where English is not the first language."

Linda Martin, the Gray Academy public speaking team coach and program director, notes that there were nine different events in the competition and each student was entered in three categories.

Martin has been leading the Gray Academy public speaking program since its inception nearly three years ago. The program was initiated by Winnipeg businessman and community leader Ray Kives. Kives' son, Michael, was a world high school debating champion when he attended St. John-Ravenscourt, a leading private school here.

Ravenscourt has had a debating program for many years and Kives was impressed with the program and how much Michael benefited from it.

He felt that such a program would be a tremendous asset to Gray Academy senior students.

Martin has been teaching public speaking and debating in Winnipeg and rural Manitoba high schools for several years. At Gray Academy, all students in Grade 7 and 8 have to take debating as part of the curriculum. For the older students, it's optional.

Coming up in early December are the Asper Cup competitions which are open to anyone in the world. Last year, teams from Australia and Israel came to Winnipeg to compete.

First Nations pastor plans 'embassy' in Jerusalem

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In the wake of a recent visit by B'nai Brith Canada and Israeli representatives to two First Nations communities in remote northern Manitoba, Winnipeg pastor Rev. Raymond McLean is making plans to move to Jerusalem and open a "First Nations Embassy" with himself as the first ambassador.

The Ahenakew affair was the catalyst for closer relations of late between Jews and native people, said Alan Yusim, director of B'nai Brith's Winnipeg office.

After First Nations leader David Ahenakew praised Hitler to a reporter in 2002, saying the Nazi dictator "fried" six million Jews to prevent Jews from taking over the world, B'nai Brith contacted Manitoba First Nations leaders and educators and arranged for a First Nations mission to Israel.

There were 10 participants, including Rev. McLean, on the first "Holocaust and Hope Mission" in 2003. The group learned about the history of Israel and the Jewish People, and about the Holocaust. They were also exposed to Israeli culture.

Rev McLean himself organized the second mission – with B'nai Brith's assistance – in the summer of 2004. Close to 30 First Nations educators and community members paid their own way. This past summer, McLean and Yusim led 44 native leaders on a third such tour of Israel.

"We met with Israeli government officials from the Foreign Ministry and NGO representatives and discussed how Israel might be able to assist impoverished Canadian First Nations communities to develop infrastructure using Israeli expertise," Yusim said.

"We have since had meetings with the Assembly of First Nations Chiefs to discuss some initiatives."

On Nov. 10, B'nai Brith and Israeli representative paid a return visit to two First Nations communities in Manitoba.

Yusim, B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant and B'nai Brith legal council Anita Bromberg, accompanied by Ronan Gil-Or, deputy head of Mission at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa; Vivian Silver, executive director of the Negev Institute for Strategic Peace and Development (and a former Winnipegger); and Rabbi Alan Green of Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue visited the isolated communities of Tadoule Lake and Oxford House.

Dimant was declared an honorary chief at Oxford House, and the local people and visitors exchanged speeches and prayers, as well as dream catchers and Shabbat candles.

"We stressed the many historical and cultural similarities between us," Yusim said.

"Both peoples have suffered persecution. We've lost our land. We have had to struggle to preserve our language and culture in the face of great adversity. And we have both been victims of genocide."

The natives and Jews discussed possible joint ventures in eco-tourism, geothermal energy development and hothouse agricultural initiatives.

As for Rev McLean's setting up residence in Jerusalem, he said he has not set a date yet, but will be moving in the next few months.

"Most likely, I will be focusing on education and advocacy activities," he said. "I would like to encourage more of our people to visit Israel."

Canada, Israel to continue with joint R&D projects

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Canada plans to establish joint research and development projects with India, Brazil and China based on the model and success of its joint ventures with Israel.

Minister of International Trade James Peterson made the announcement at the 21st meeting of the board of directors of the Canada Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF) held here recently.

With the renewal of CIIRDF's commitment from both governments until the year 2010, Israel has now become Canada's longest-standing technology partner. Five new projects were unconditionally approved at the meeting, with another pending, for a total value of over $8 million. The projects are from the aerospace, medical devices, software and manufacturing sectors.

Peterson praised CIIRDF's results and spoke with optimism about its ongoing work. "I understand your record with commercialization has been very high, and that for a small sum of $10 million over the last decade, Canadian businesses have had returns of some $70 million," he said. "We are particularly pleased with the enthusiasm that [CIIRDF president] Henri Rothschild has brought to this organization.

"I certainly intend to be a force in our trade relationship, and we look with a great deal of hope at what we see in the Middle East today and we wish you continued success and a very warm shalom," Peterson said.

Eli Opper, chief scientist in Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade, chaired the meeting. He thanked the Canadian government for its co-operation. "I can assure you that we are thrilled with the level of participation and the very hard work that has been brought to us through the aegis of Mr. Blais [Jean-Jacques Blais, former Canadian minister of defence] and the other Canadians who have been involved in this work," he said.

Following the meeting in Ottawa, Opper and other CIIRDF directors travelled to Toronto for meetings with representatives of the Ontario government to begin implementing the Ontario-Israel Science and Technology Agreement signed earlier this year by Ehud Olmert and Premier Dalton McGuinty.

Annual jazz concert in Hamilton

The Friends group decided they would present an annual concert featuring the biggest names in Canadian and international jazz. For the first concert, in 1999, they recruited Guido Basso, the wonderful flugelhorn player. That concert raised $15,000. The following years brought other jazz greats to the annual concert. Phil Nimmons was featured in year two.

Over the years, the college has attracted some internationally renowned artists to lead its master classes.

Kenny Wheeler and singer, Norma Winstone, led several days of master classes at Mohawk College. A St. Catherines native, Wheeler played trumpet with the Canadian Armed Forces band during World War II. He left Canada for Britain after the war and made an international reputation, recording some 50 CDs.

Trumpet player Wynton Marsalis, who was in Hamilton for a concert, was asked to do a master class with the college's brass students. Not only did he agree to come, but when asked what his fee would be, he said, "I wouldn't charge you." He spent more than half a day working with the students.

The Friends group has established seven full-tuition scholarships at Mohawk College and master classes in jazz and classics, as well as purchasing a magnificent Yamaha grand piano for the music department, through the annual concerts and bi-annual black-tie soirées at the Tamahaac Club in Ancaster. This winter, arranger and composer Bob Brookmeyer appears in concert at Mohawk as part of an artist-in-residence program.

Each music-department scholarship is for a full year's tuition. One scholarship is from Parkdale International, given in memory of Marvin Goldblatt's wife Lillian. The Harris Steel Group, in memory of Milt Harris, created another one.

Paikin hopes to add an additional scholarship each year, and he is "confident we can make that happen."

'Israel-positive' messages needed on campus: Farber

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish campus groups and organizations face a twofold challenge: they must decide what they want to say and then choose the best way to say it, said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress.

General Assembly

Farber was addressing a group of some 50 people at last week's United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto about the responsibility Jewish organizations have in maintaining a positive Jewish presence on campus and in the community, and about the experience of Jewish groups at Canadian colleges and universities.

He was on a panel with Paula Simon, executive director of the Milwaukee Jewish Council for Community Relations, and Jonathan Michael Cates, a student at the University of Michigan, who highlighted the challenges they face on campuses in their respective locales.

As an example of the kind of issues his organization deals with, Farber referred to last February's Israel Apartheid Week at the University of Toronto, which was organized by pro-Palestinian student groups to run simultaneously with IsraelFest, a festival that celebrates Israeli culture that is organized by Hillel, a Jewish campus group.

He said many Jewish groups, motivated by anger, sent e-mails, set up meetings, and made public appeals for outright bans of the event.

But he said organizations such as CJC and Hillel chose a different approach.

"[We] recognized that Israel Apartheid Week was a desperate attempt by the usual suspects to provoke the Jewish community into an intemperate response, such as demanding that the university shut down the offending program," Farber said.

Instead of giving the event more publicity and attention then it deserved, Farber said, CJC and Hillel encouraged students to "stay the course and concentrate on sending out what we termed 'an Israel-positive message.'"

He gave other Canadian examples of the challenges facing Jewish students.

One was an Israeli–Arab who had been invited to speak at a Vancouver-area college about multiculturalism in Israel, but was denied the right to speak on campus because the college's executive board objected to the fact he had served in the Israel Defence Forces.

Bernie Farber

Farber also mentioned Students for Palestinian Human Rights – a group he described as a "major pain in our tuches here in Canada" – which has distributed posters vilifying Israeli soldiers and comparing the IDF to Nazi soldiers.

In response to such incidents, Farber said, the CJC has worked closely with Hillel to create more of a pro-Israel presence on campus.

One example was when Hillel invited Daniel Pipes, a Middle East commentator, to speak at York University in 2002.

This effort was especially significant, because former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu had been prevented from speaking at Concordia University in Montreal earlier in the year due to a "violent protest staged by the SPHR," Farber said.

"Sadly, this became the paradigm and universities became scared to bring Middle East speakers [to campuses], especially pro-Israel speakers. So we were determined to change this paradigm."

He said that after people got wind that Pipes was invited to speak at York, the university cancelled the event under pressure.

When the school's president considered cancelling the event a second time for security reasons, CJC stepped in.

"Using well-connected Jewish alumni who donate generously to the university to make a call to the president's office, while simultaneously leaking to the press the fact that free speech was potentially being stifled at York, helped turn this matter around" and Pipes spoke on campus in January 2003, Farber said.

But as important as it is to make sure pro-Israel voices are heard on campus, he said, work needs to be done to create an image of Israel that is independent of the Mideast conflict and focuses on positive developments and advancements that continue to come out of Israel.

Sharon sends taped greetings

Bielski noted that as part of Operation Promise, the Jewish Agency and Israel's absorption ministry have partnered in a public campaign dubbed Bayit B'Yachad (At Home Together). Delegates viewed ads that are airing on Israeli television touting the successful integration of immigrants from the FSU and Ethiopia, but warning there's still much to be done.

In a videotaped greeting to the 4,000 delegates attending the GA, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon voiced his support for more immigration to Israel.

"Israel is a homeland not just for our children, but also for yours," he said. "That is why increasing aliyah is a challenge that we share. We must work to encourage aliyah from the United States, Canada and the rest of the western world."

Sharon had particular praise for Nefesh B'Nefesh, which encourages aliyah from North America, and for educational programs such as birthright israel and MASA, which supports long-term programs in Israel for young Diaspora Jews.

Opening the international plenary was actor Valerie Harper, who performed a scene from her smash one-woman Broadway show Golda's Balcony, about the life of former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir.

Likud, Labour agree to hold vote on dissolution

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Gideon Sa'ar, the chair of the Likud caucus in the Knesset, announced Monday afternoon that the two largest parties, Likud and Labor, had decided to vote on a bill to dissolve the Knesset later in the day.

Sa'ar did not indicate if both sides had agreed on an election date.

The announcement was made despite Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's earlier request to President Moshe Katsav to dissolve the 16th Knesset and call for early elections, and before Sharon announced that he is leaving Likud and establishing a new centrist party.

After his meeting with Sharon, Katsav said the prime minister had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to carry on within the current Knesset.

Katsav indicated that he would make a quick decision on Sharon's request after consulting Attorney General Menachem Mazuz, adding that an early election appears inevitable in the current political climate.

The law gives him 21 days to decide, Katsav said, but added that he would do so quickly. "I think we need to dissolve the Knesset and hold elections as soon as possible," he said.

Asked whether the decision would be made within days, he replied, "less than days."

The law would require elections to be held within 90 days after the dissolution of the Knesset. This means that the vote would likely take place by the beginning of March 2006. Army Radio speculated that March 8 was now the most likely date for the elections.

To avoid elections, Sa'ar said he was still trying to form a bloc of 61 MKs who would support an alternative prime minister, but it remained unlikely that a single candidate could muster sufficient support.

Israel Radio quoted Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin, a Likud hard-liner, as saying Monday that Katsav should not immediately agree to dissolve the Knesset.

Following Sharon's departure, Likud central committee chair Tzachi Hanegbi will take over as party leader. Israel Radio reported that he will convene the Likud central committee on Thursday to vote for a new chair.

The list of expected contenders includes MKs Benjamin Netanyahu and Uzi Landau, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, Education Minister Limor Livnat, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and MK Yisrael Katz.

Netanyahu had asked ministers Mofaz, Meir Sheetrit and Gideon Ezra on Sunday to remain in the Likud.

announced he would contest the Likud leadership if Sharon quit the party, had yet to give his answer as of the CJN's deadline.

A Sharon associate said the new party could become the largest in the Knesset, predicting that Likud MKs would not be the only ones to join.

Some non-Likud personalities who were reportedly planning to stand with Sharon include former Shin Bet chief Avi Dichter, Ben Gurion University president Avishai Braverman and former Likud minister Dan Meridor, who has expressed a desire to return to politics.

Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who met with Sharon on Sunday to talk about future co-operation, will not leave the Labor party to join Sharon's new party, Peres aides said after the meeting.

The committed members said their new party would be a "true centrist party, from every perspective – political, economic and social."

Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, who was expected to hand in his letter of resignation Monday along with the other Labor cabinet members, said Sharon's decision presents Labor with "an historic opportunity to contend with not just Likud, but with another party.

"We need to consider now who will bring the central economic and social salvation – [Benjamin] Netanyahu, Sharon or Labor," Ben-Eliezer said.

Shalom visits Tunis, pushes for diplomatic relations

By YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom used his address to a UN technology summit in Tunis last Wednesday to urge Tunisia to resume diplomatic ties with Israel.

Shalom, who is originally from Tunisia, spoke in Tunisian-accented Arabic in honour of his host country.

Tunisian President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali hosted all the heads of state attending the World Summit on the Information Society for dinner Wednesday night, and Shalom was also invited, even though he is not a head of state. Shalom was also scheduled to meet Friday with several Tunisian ministers.

Nevertheless, government sources said they do not believe that Tunisia, which severed ties with Israel following the start of the second intifadah in September 2000, is likely to resume diplomatic relations anytime soon.

Shalom also met Wednesday with President Ely Ould Mohamed Vall of Mauritania, one of four Muslim countries that Israel has full diplomatic relations with. Vall stressed that he is committed to maintaining and even strengthening these ties. This was his first meeting with a senior Israeli official, as he came to power in a non-violent coup in August.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas also attended the Shalom-Vall meeting, and Israel requested his aid in forging ties with other Arab and Muslim countries.

Abbas used his speech at the summit to urge Israel to halt the operations of Israeli cellphone companies in Palestinian territory, which he termed an "invasion." He also charged that Israel's control of radio frequencies, and the fact Israel serves as the PA's communications gateway to the rest of the world, has prevented a Palestinian communications industry from developing.

"We have no direct phone lines," he said. "We have no international dialing code and no control [over] our radio frequencies," he said.

Abbas also urged Israel to begin negotiations on a final-status agreement. He praised the agreement reached earlier in the week over the operation of the Rafah border crossing between Gaza and Egypt, but stressed that he hoped it would lead to agreements on other issues.

Abbas and Shalom also held two bilateral meetings on Wednesday, constituting the highest-level Israeli-Palestinian contacts in the past several months.

The first meeting between the two was by chance. "It was an unscheduled meeting," an Israeli official said. "They met by accident."

Nevertheless, Abbas referred to it as "a good meeting" during a subsequent news conference. "We discussed the agreement reached [Tuesday]," he said.

"We discussed the continuation of such meetings. I reminded him that this [the Rafah deal] was the first agreement signed in five years, and that now we should really close that gap and not only implement what has been signed but sign new agreements."

The second meeting, held later in the day, was planned. Foreign Ministry officials declined to say what was discussed at this meeting, but said Shalom and Abbas spoke for a few minutes and held a "friendly" conversation.

Communications Minister Dalia Itzik, who also attended the summit, was able to chat with her Iraqi counterpart, Jwan Fouad Maasoum, since the delegations were arranged in alphabetic order, which meant the Israelis and Iraqis sat side by side. The two discussed the potential for Israeli-Iraqi co-operation in developing a fiber optic link between Europe and the Middle East. Israel already has a fibre optic link to Europe, so Iraq could theoretically hook into the Israeli network via Jordan, and the Gulf States could then link up via Iraq.

On Thursday, Shalom and his mother, who accompanied him to Tunisia, visited their former hometown Gabes in the southwestern part of the country. Shalom reportedly attended a Minchah service at the local synagogue, where his parents were married.

The trip was originally supposed to happen earlier in the week, but was postponed because Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi was there.

Wider co-operation sought with Vatican

Angelo Sodano, that he would do everything possible to "accelerate" talks on the tax status of the Catholic Church "and to answer positively to the requests of the Church."

Israeli officials have said the dispute, over issues including the tax obligation for Roman Catholic holdings and methods to resolve property disputes, is the main obstacle to wider co-operation between the Vatican and Israel.

The Vatican is seeking ways to lessen its tax burden as one of the significant land owners in the Holy Land and wants access to Israeli courts to handle any quarrels over ownership.

Israel strongly resists giving any special tax exemptions to the Vatican and has offered to create a special panel to oversee property cases involving the Holy See. Israel fears that giving the Catholic Church special tax terms could open the door for other churches and groups to seek similar loopholes.

Katsav told a press conference after the visit that talks on the issues were going well and that working groups would "try to close the outstanding issues as soon as possible." He said "almost all the issues had been resolved," although he didn't elaborate.

A Vatican statement said merely that "particular attention" had been paid to the issue during the talks.

U.S. President George W. Bush, who is currently courting the U.S. Catholic Church, told Sharon recently that he must end the stalemate over the tax issue, after which Sharon ordered that the issue be handled urgently.

Israel has tried to convince the U.S. government that it has already done all it can for the Vatican.

The Vatican's deputy spokesperson, the Rev. Ciro Benedettini, said the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and efforts to improve collaboration in the humanitarian field, particularly in Africa, were also discussed during Katsav's meetings.

Iran approves bill barring UN inspectors from nuclear sites

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Iranian Parliament on Sunday approved the outline of a bill that would bar UN inspectors from its nuclear sites if the agency referred Iran's case to the Security Council for possible punitive measures, reported the New York Times.

This development came on the heels of a warning from an unnamed diplomat last week that Iran has begun processing a new batch of uranium despite western pressure on it to halt sensitive atomic work.

The move to process the uranium comes before a Nov. 24 meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) board of governors, which could report Iran to the UN Security Council. The council has the power to impose sanctions.

Western countries suspect Iran of seeking nuclear weapons under the cover of a civilian atomic program, which Tehran vehemently denies, saying it only wants to generate electricity.

Iran had notified the IAEA in late October that it intended to process a new batch of uranium at its Isfahan uranium conversion plant but did not start the work two weeks ago as originally planned.

"Conversion has resumed," the diplomat, who is close to the IAEA, told Reuters. A spokesperson for the UN nuclear watchdog did not confirm the statement, but said IAEA inspectors were in Isfahan.

"This [new uranium processing] is a rebuff to efforts to create some space to continue negotiations," the diplomat said.

"It looks like Iran is confident the board will opt not to refer them. And there's a good chance of that, since many board members don't have the stomach for such a move."

The three major European Union powers – Germany, Britain and France – which led now-stalled nuclear talks with Iran, and the United States have tentatively approved a Russian proposal to overcome a stalemate over Iran's nuclear project.

The plan would allow Iran to continue nuclear fuel production if it shifted its most critical stage, uranium enrichment, to Russia as part of a joint venture.

Enrichment, the step that follows conversion, purifies uranium to the level needed to fuel power plants or, if enriched further, to the level needed to fuel a nuclear weapon.

Iran had told the IAEA that this conversion batch would involve 150 drums of raw yellow-cake uranium. Once converted into uranium hexafluoride gas, the feed material for centrifuges, and enriched, this would be enough for an atom bomb.

The diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity, did not give details on exactly what steps had been taken at the Isfahan plant other than to say the process of conversion had begun. Tehran, while saying it prefers resuming negotiations to sliding into open confrontation, has reiterated a resolve to develop its own nuclear fuel cycle, citing its sovereign right as a member of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Diplomats say IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei is considering flying to Iran to try to nail down the Russian compromise plan, but only if it will win the backing of major players.

While Germany, Britain, France and the U.S. have pushed to send Iran to the Security Council, Russia and China have resisted – and as permanent council members could veto any punitive steps.

Some developing nations on the board do not want to set a precedent that might curb their own nuclear energy options.

ElBaradei distributed a new report on investigations into Iran's nuclear program to the 35 member states of the agency's board last Friday, setting the stage for Nov. 24.

In a related development, a senior U.S. official said Iran's threat to destroy Israel disqualifies it from achieving nuclear-weapons capability.

"A country that threatens 'death' to other countries must be denied the most deadly of weapons," Gregory Schulte, the U.S. envoy to the IAEA, the UN nuclear watchdog, said last Thursday in Vienna.

Israel rallies support for Pollard

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — As of Monday, Nov. 21, Jonathan Pollard had been imprisoned for 7,304 days.

Now, for the first time since he was jailed by the United States more than 20 years ago for spying on behalf of Israel, an Israeli government authority is seeking to rally broad public support here for "Pollard's contribution to the State of Israel."

In accordance with a directive by Education Minister Limor Livnat, all schools were to spend one hour Tuesday learning about Pollard's case. Teachers were to recall the events leading to his imprisonment, and they were instructed to discuss the obligations of Israel toward him with their students.

Former U.S. naval officer marks 20 years in jail for spying

Previously, Israel had officially avoided any expression of identification with Pollard, a U.S. naval intelligence officer who decided to pass on to Israel information about the production of weapons of mass destruction in Arab countries, after he realized that his superiors were prevented from doing so.

For years, activities in Israel on behalf of Pollard have been nearly the sole province of Israel's national religious camp.

Asher Mivtzari, a former resident of Kfar Darom in the Gaza Strip, recruited rabbis from the movement to the cause. They brought in sympathetic politicians, who then pressured Livnat into taking action.

Hundreds of rabbis recently devoted their weekly Shabbat sermons to a discussion of the religious commandment to redeem prisoners, tying it to the fate of Pollard.

One of the more prominent of these rabbis was Yaakov Meidan, head of the Har Etzion Yeshiva in Alon Shvut – and a figure who is familiar to many non-observant Israelis because of his outreach efforts.

"Pollard didn't murder, rape or rob," Rabbi Meidan said. "True, he broke a law in his country and violated the trust of his employers… but he only wanted to do everything he could so that his people, the remnants of the destruction in Europe, would not once again fall victim to the desires of bloodthirsty rulers who seek to destroy the Jews."

In his sermon, Rabbi Meidan said that the United States was obligated according to its agreements with Israel to pass on information about Arab weapons programs, but it failed to do so.

"We live in a country that occasionally frees murderers and their commanders under pressure from 'Big Sister' [meaning the United States]. Former [U.S.] president Bill Clinton set free 14 Puerto Rican terrorists, members of an organization that was responsible for attacks in the United States, but found all possible excuses to violate his promise to [then prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu] in the Wye River Accord and did not release Pollard," he added.

A rally to demand Pollard's release was scheduled for Wednesday across from the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem. Among those expected to participate were former Prisoners of Zion Azam Azam, the Israeli Druze man who was imprisoned in Egypt for several years; Pollard's wife Esther; and Chief Sephardi Rabbi Shlomo Amar.

The Committee to Free Pollard hopes that many more people will join the effort to bring about his release.

Iran satellite can eye Israel

An Iranian satellite can spy on Israel. Iran launched the Russian-made Sina-1 into space last month to monitor natural disasters, but its space program director acknowledged to Associated Press that it also could spy on Israel. However, he denied it would be put to such a purpose. "We don't need to do it," he said. "You can buy satellite photos of Israeli streets from the market." An Israeli satellite, Ofek-5, has monitored Iran and Syria since 2002.

German subs on the way?

Germany has reportedly offered to sell Israel two new submarines at a discount. The outgoing German government, after vacillating on the Dolphin submarine sale for several years, offered them to the Israel at a reduced price of around $1.17 billion (US), Der Spiegel and Focus magazines reported. Israel, which has pressed Germany for a larger discount or even to donate the subs had no immediate comment. In the 1990s, Israel received two Dolphins for free from Germany and bought a third at a fraction of its full price.

Israel, Qatar sign air deal

Israel's Arkia airline signed a partnership with a Gulf Arab airline. Under the deal announced last week, Israelis will be able to take Arkia to Amman, Jordan, then travel to some 20 destinations on Qatar Airways. There are still no direct air connections between Israel and Qatar, which has low-level diplomatic contacts with the Jewish state, but Arkia says the deal gives Israelis the right to transit through Qatar's airport. Qatar would not comment on the deal.

NATO generals in Israel

NATO air force chiefs held a security conference with Israel. The annual event was held in Tel Aviv last week as part of the organization's Partnership for Peace and Mediterranean Dialogue, and focused on the use of air power in national security. According to Israeli sources, the NATO officers were especially interested in Israel's advanced command and control systems. Israel has been in talks with NATO about developing closer relations.

Israel, EU to talk trade

Israel and the European Union opened talks on the free trade of fish and produce. Covering both fresh and processed products, the deal will be discussed as a part of the Euro-Mediterranean partnerships, of which Israel, nine other countries and the Palestinian Authority are members. The idea of a free-trade agreement between Israel and the EU was launched in 1995 and is seen as a key step toward increasing European investment in Israel. The agreement is expected to take effect Jan. 1, 2007.

Female rabbinical student befriends stripper in one-woman show

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Jackie Mason as a fairy godmother. A stripping female rabbinical student. Madonna songs.

What sounds like patches from a quirky dream are really some of the elements comprising Tracey Erin Smith's one-woman show, The Burning Bush. Playing at Toronto's Lula Lounge on Nov. 28, the show follows a rabbinical student who finds another way to "reveal" the truth.

Over lunch, I ask Smith what she means by "reveal."

She laughs. "No, there's no nudity, just a bit of cleavage. It's all very vaudevillian."

Smith plays Barbara, an overly earnest rabbinical student recently cast out by the head professor. In a daze, she wanders into a strip joint and befriends a stripper obsessed with Madonna. Knowing that Madonna (or Esther, as she's sometimes called) follows Kabbalah, the stripper asks Barbara to teach her the mystical doctrine. When she leads a Torah study class for the interested strippers, Barbara learns her own lesson while watching her "students" perform: audiences love an entertainer.

"She thinks, 'No one has looked at a rabbi liked that,'" says Smith.

The show's overall message is inspiring, Smith adds. "It's about getting in the game and following whatever vision you have. But it's also about one woman finding an unlikely friendship."

And an unlikely fairy godmother. Comedian Jackie Mason makes an appearance, albeit in puppet form, as a source of motivation for the young Barbara. In fact, fiction isn't that far separated from the truth.

Smith admits the show was originally titled I Want to Marry Jackie Mason. "He's an idol to me," she says, her eyes brimming with admiration. "He used to be a rabbi, but he found it wasn't for him because he wanted to tell the truth through jokes, through entertainment. In my mind, that's a true rabbi."

It didn't take long for Smith to nab a ringing endorsement from the plutzing jokester himself. When Mason performed in Toronto last year, Smith contacted him on a whim and eventually scheduled a sit-down at Tim Horton's. (Smith flips into Mason mode: "He says he loves the French crullers, because they're so light and fluffy, just half the calories of a regular doughnut.") She told him about her show and Mason said it sounded "great, with lots of commercial potential."

Tracey Erin Smith

He added: "And if it's too short, throw in a few songs."

So she did. The Burning Bush has already won favour with critics when it premiered at the Edmonton Fringe Festival. Smith noticed many generations enjoying the show, which may relieve any paranoid parents who view a strip-joint rabbi as heresy.

Smith expects a packed house at the performance, particularly because Toronto is her hometown. After graduating from the Claude Watson School of the Arts, Smith studied theatre at McGill University before attending the theatre school Studio 58 in Vancouver. She's performed everything from Shakespeare to musicals across North America, and she teaches improvisation to seniors at Ryerson University's Act II theatre school.

Working so ardently on The Burning Bush for several years, Smith wants to see the production find its feet past Toronto. In fact, she mentions she is looking for producers and directors for upcoming productions.

I wonder if Smith is facing an uphill battle. Torah and comedy. Is that a mix most congregants appreciate?

"Look at why comedy clubs are more packed than synagogues," she says. "People want to laugh rather than be saved."

The Burning Bush plays at the Lula Lounge at 8:00 p.m. on Nov. 28. For tickets, $15, $10 for students and seniors, call 416-986-3495.

New Canadian documentary pays tribute to Modigliani

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Amadeo Modigliani lived a life of pain, pleasure and tragedy, and was possibly the greatest Italian painter since the Renaissance era.

Born in Livorno, Italy, in 1884, he died in Paris in 1920, much too young, from the effects of consumption, tuberculosis and a libertine lifestyle.

Modigliani, whose works were exhibited at an Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO) retrospective until last January, is now the subject of Harry Rasky's documentary, Modigliani: Body and Soul.

The one-hour film, which traces the trajectory of Modigliani's life and artistic development, will premiere at the Isabel Bader Theatre on Monday, Nov. 28, and will be screened on TV-Ontario on Thursday, Dec. 1, at 10 p.m. in its North American television premiere.

Commissioned by TVO and produced in association with the CBC, the film was made with major financial support from local philanthropists Joey and Toby Tanenbaum, patrons of the AGO.

Rasky, a seasoned Canadian filmmaker, clearly admires Modigliani, and his reverence shines through this hagiographic movie.

The camera pans lovingly and at length on Modigliani's luminous paintings, stolid sculptures and delicate drawings, and Rasky exhalts him as a giant. Yet strangely enough, this film is emotionally flat.

Portrait of Jeanne Hebuterne Seated in Profile. 1918.

The son of a bankrupt Sephardi banker, Modigliani was a sickly child who was adored and nourished by his devoted mother.

He studied in Florence and Venice before moving to Paris in 1906. There, in a country that had just been scarred by the infamous Dreyfus affair, he encountered the indignity of anti-Semitism for the first time.

Instead of shying away from his Jewish identity, he revelled in it. When he met someone new, he proclaimed, "My name is Modigliani, Jew."

Not one to gravitate toward landscapes, of which he produced only a handful, he was excited by the prospect of honing his talents as a sculptor. But being asthmatic, he could barely tolerate the dust thrown up by stone. Nonetheless, Modigliani turned out a series of strong African and Mayan-style sculptures.

Portraits and nudes, however, were his forte, and for these he will be remembered. Modigliani's curvaceous and erotic reclining nudes shocked sensibilities, but he took this particular art form to a new level.

"To paint a woman is to possess her," he would say in a rhetorical flourish.

His stylized portraits, featuring elongated and angular faces, some with their eyes shut, established new norms.

Mason Klein, a curator at the Jewish Museum in Manahttan, says Modigliani, a wonderful colourist, pushed portraiture to abstract extremes.

As Rasky observes, Modigliani's friends and lovers were his key models. One of them, Simone Thiroux, was from the province of Quebec.

Women took to him like bees to honey, and tended to "mother" him, Rasky comments. In fact, Modigliani, as he appears in a series of photographs, was a handsome, dashing man who could set hearts aflutter.

Modigliani mixed with Pablo Picasso and with such up-and-coming Jewish artists as Chaim Soutine and Marc Chagall. But being an assimilated Italian Jew, he had little in common with these eastern European Jews, Rasky notes.

Modigliani was the quintessential and legendarily impoverished artist who barely kept body and soul together. He drank and smoked to excess and consumed hashish. No wonder he was usually in poor health.

Toward the close of the film, Rasky shows his respect for Modigliani and his fealty to Jewish tradition by placing a solitary stone on Modigliani's weathered gravestone in Paris.

It's an unusual gesture. Filmmakers are generally far more detached in dealing with their subjects. But Rasky loves Modigliani, and in this documentary, he pays abundant tribute to him as "an artist of the world."

TSO holiday concert features a children's opera

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Elijah's Angel, a children's opera based on an award-winning book about a young Jewish boy and an elderly black man named Elijah, will be presented by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

The opera will be performed together with Polar Express, the story of a boy who boards a mysterious train bound for the North Pole in search of a special gift, at the TSO's Special Family Christmas Concert at Roy Thomson Hall on Dec. 11.

In Elijah's Angel, Elijah, a woodcarver, gives the boy, Michael, a carving of an angel. The story is based on a real-life experience the Columbus, Ohio-born author Michael J. Rosen had. At 19, Rosen met a black man named Elijah, an elderly woodcarver, who gave him a carving of an angel.

"A Jewish kid, a nine-year-old, brings home a graven image, an icon that is clearly a Christian symbol that doesn't particularly reside in a Jewish home, so I tried to create a story in the book that it is more a gesture, a symbol of friendship – than of any religious connotation," says Rosen.

"There is reciprocity – the child ends up bringing Elijah a menorah that he's made at Sunday school… Elijah in the book and in real life was from a family of slaves and spoke in a way that was remarkably different and harmonious that was stunning to this kid and also to me as an adult."

Rosen has received several awards and citations for Elijah's Angel, including the National Jewish Book Award, the Simon Wiesenthal Museum Of Tolerance Once Upon A World Book Award and the Living The Dream Award for the book that most embodies the teachings of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The opera Elijah's Angel was commissioned by the Bronx Arts Ensemble and originally premiered in Boston on Dec. 6, 1998. Rob Kapilow is the composer and the libretto was written by Jim Friedland.

"I wanted to create a holiday concert that would welcome everyone," says Kapilow, who among children and parents alike is dubbed "the pied piper of music."

Rob Kapilow composed the score to Elijah's Angel.

Kapilow, from Bergen County, N.J., is often compared to Leonard Bernstein, who entertained children by introducing them to the joys of classical music.

"The key for me to Michael Rosen's story is the idea that a young Jewish boy and an elderly black woodcarver develop a friendship in which each learns that the differences that separate us are not as significant as the human connections that can bring us together, says Kapilow, who will be conducting the TSO for the performance.

Kapilow is interested in tradition and how it evolves over time. In Elijah's Angel, he says he "attempted to breathe new life into traditional tunes. Audiences should listen for the Chanukah song Mi Yemalel, which is woven into the work," he says.

Kapilow is looking forward to presenting Elijah's Angel to Toronto audiences for the first time. "This holiday concert is part of the TSO's impressive commitment to education and family as it encourages tolerance and understanding among all people as we reach the holiday season together, he says.

For tickets to the TSO's Special Family Christmas Concert at 3 p.m. on Dec. 11 at Roy Thomson Hall, call 416-593-4828 or visit www.tso.ca.

L'chaim Retirement Home

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein with her mother Terry

Dear Judy:
I want to thank you, Esther, and your outstanding staff for how beautifully you helped my mother make the transition to retirement life. She is so happy with her new friends and the loving attention she gets from the staff. I am so impressed: the staff doesn't just "work" there, they really care about the residents and their families, and treat everyone with such dignity and warmth. L'chaim doesn't feel at all like an institution, it feels like a family. It was an excellent choice!
Best wishes, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

JEWISH GOSPEL SINGER JOSHUA NELSON IN CONCERT DEC. 4

Often described as a kosher male version of Mahalia Jackson, the phenomenal Jewish gospel singer Joshua Nelson is preparing for a Toronto concert in support of Camp George, a Reform summer camp near Parry Sound.

Nelson regularly receives raves for his concerts and his ability to get audiences clapping and even dancing in the aisles has often been noted. He'll be singing at Temple Sinai, Sunday Dec. 4, 7:30 p.m. Adults $36, children and youths $18. Camp George office, 416-638-2635.

Nelson's latest CD, Mi Chamocha, features an assortment of liturgical and gospel favourites: Nelson, at his electrifying best, is backed up by the Kosher Gospel Singers. The title track was arranged by local musician-songwriter Ari Posner.

Comedy Screening: The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick, the award-winning comedy film based on the novel by Toronto writer Morley Torgov, tells the story of an ordinary Jewish kid growing up, circa 1960, in a small Manitoba town. Made in 1988, the film stars Noam Zylberman in the title role, Fairuza Balk as the non-Jewish pianist he falls for, and Saul Rubinek as a wisecracking rabbi.

The film is being screened as part of a continuing series of Jewish-content films presented by film critic Bill Stern and Shlomo Schwartzberg, former programmer of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. Activist Judy Feld Carr, who was born in a small town in Ontario, is scheduled to introduce the film and actor Howard Jerome is expected to attend. $5. Bloor Cinema, Sunday, Nov. 27, 2 p.m.

What's Doing at Israel's: David Rotenberg, a Toronto writer, director and acting teacher, has produced the fifth installment of the "Zhong Fong" series of mystery books. The Golden Mountain Murders (McArthur & Co.) starts deep in the Anhui province in China and ends on the streets of Vancouver. Rotenberg's reading is Wednesday, Nov. 23, 7:30 p.m.

Award-winning journalist Isabel Vincent brings to light a dark chapter of our history in her third book, Bodies and Souls: The Trafficking of Jewish Immigrant Prostitutes in the Americas. The book launch is Sunday, Nov. 27, 7:30 p.m.

Israel's Judaica, 870 Eglinton Ave. W. Kosher refreshments, free admission. 416-256-1010.

Arab-Israeli Cookbook: Studio 180, a Toronto theatre company, has announced it will stage a production of the hit United Kingdom play The Arab-Israeli Cookbook, by Roni Soans, in Toronto next March. The play has had a successful run in Los Angeles.

To create this piece of documentary theatre, Soans interviewed many people from a wide range of backgrounds, delving into their homes, kitchens and restaurants. The characters describe their daily struggles under the difficult political situation and share favourite recipes and cook meals on stage. The play is about how "people go about their daily lives and retain hope… in situations that are intransigent and fraught with danger," Soans said.

Berkeley Street Theatre. $15 to $35. March 3 to April 1, 2006. 416-368-3110 or www.ticketking.com

Primer heightens understanding of Arab-Israeli conflict

Israelis and Palestinians: Why Do They Fight? Can They Stop?* by Bernard Wasserstein, Yale University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Even at the best of times, Israel's relations with the Palestinians are fraught with problems. The long shadow of history drives them apart.

But as Bernard Wasserstein observes in Israelis and Palestinians: Why Do They Fight? Can They Stop? Israeli and Palestinian societies are largely interdependent.

A number of forces, from demography to economics, shape their relationship and force them to co-operate. Wasserstein, a professor of history at the University of Chicago, examines these factors in this thoughtful book, now out in a new paperback edition.

Wasserstein's analysis of the demographic imperative, grounded in the territorial issue, is by far the most compelling dimension of his argument.

Demography, which the scholar Auguste Comte once described as "destiny," has been and will be of the utmost importance in determining Israel's future as a Jewish, democratic state.

Three years ago, Israel's National Security Council issued a sombre report suggesting that its borders should be fixed on the basis of "demographic and security considerations." This report, in part at least, persuaded Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that a withdrawal from the Gaza Strip was in Israel's vital interests.

As Wasserstein points out, demography has been at the centre of Zionism since the serious renewal of Jewish settlement in Palestine in the late 19th century. From the outset, Zionist leaders, from Arthur Ruppin to Chaim Weizmann, implicitly understood that a Jewish state could not be formed unless there was a Jewish critical mass.

In 1914, 85,000 Jews lived in Palestinine, comprising about 12 per cent of the population. By 1929, Palestine was home to 156,000 Jews, or 16 per cent of the populace. With the rise of fascism in Europe, still more Jews poured in.

The demographic balance was ineradicably transformed by the Holocaust and the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. These events gave Jews an absolute majority within the newly created state of Israel. Under the 1947 Palestine partition plan, Arabs would have constituted 40 per cent of the Jewish state's population and a ticking demographic time bomb.

Bernard Wasserstein

The period from 1949 to '67 marked the high-water mark of the Zionist attempt to create what Wasserstein calls "a hermetic Jewish economy and society" in Israel.

But with Israel's occupation of the territories in the Six Day War, demograpy emerged yet again as a prime factor. By 2003, the Palestinian population of Gaza and the West Bank had grown to some 3.3 million, fuelled by a higher Arab birthrate. And in Israel itself, the Arab community had increased to 1.3 million, all this at a time when the influx of Soviet Jews into Israel was partially offset by the steady flow of emigrants out of the country.

These figures prompted a Haifa University geographer named Arnon Soffer to warn that, by 2020, Jews would likely account for only 42 per cent of the population in an area encompassing Israel, Gaza and the West Bank. Wasserstein suggests that such dire forecasts galvanized Jewish proponents of territorial compromise, both on the left and right.

Wasserstein, who wrote this book prior to the Gaza pullout, argues that "the negative consequences" of Israel's occupation of the territories will grow more acute with the passage of time.

As he puts it: "An entire civilian population cannot be kept permanently under conditions of curfew and martial law that prevent the conduct of ordinary daily life. This is not a condition of security; it is a recipe for an explosion."

He adds: "The majority of Israelis do not view the preservation of the settlements as a fundamental objective of the Israeli state, nor as a contribution to its security. Nor do they equate the interests of the settlers with those of the state in general. The likelihood, therefore, is that sooner or later, some substantial withdrawal from the settlements will take place."

Considering that Israelis and Palestinians was written when Israel's disengagement from Gaza and four West Bank settlements was still an idea rather than a fait accompli, Wassserstein's powers of prescience are quite remarkable.

He contends that the mainstream Palestinian demand for the "right of return" is probably a bargaining chip, not a genuine political objective. He quotes a prominent Palestinian official, Jibril Rajoub, as saying that this demand is not aimed at calling into question "the demographic balance in Israel."

With this in mind, Wasserstein notes that most Israelis and Palestinians support a two-state solution. Citing a European Union memorandum, he says that both sides have already demonstrated flexiblity vis-a-vis territory.

At the 2001 Taba talks, the Palestinians were reportedly prepared to yield 3.1 per cent of the West Bank to Israel within the framework of a peace agreement. Israel wanted to retain six per cent of the West Bank. Drawing optimistic conclusions from these negotiations, Wasserstein maintains that land swaps can resolve remaining differences.

He believes that the Palestinians, having already given up 78 per cent of Palestine to accommodate Israel within its pre-1967 borders, are historically entitled to the rest of it in the West Bank and Gaza.

Bringing context to his discussion on the land question, Wasserstein devotes a considerable amount of space to the various partition plans Britain presented to Jews and Arabs during the 1922 to-'48 Mandate period.

The origins of partition, he notes, lay in Britain's failure to establish a "unified political community" of Jews and Arabs in Palestine.

Long before partition was even on the table, he says, Britain laid the basis for it by means of policies that institutionalized the social and economic lines of division between Arabs and Jews.

But the 1947 United Nations partition plan, which the Arabs rejected, was designed to foster co-operation.

Fast forwarding to the post-1967 era, Wasserstein says that the Allon Plan, devised by Israel's deputy prime minister, Yigal Allon, had a profound influence on Israeli policy.

Allon envisaged the establishment of a buffer zone in the Jordan Valley to ward off a possible armoured attack from Iraq, the widening of the vulnerable Jerusalem corridor, the rectification of Israel's eastern border and Palestinian autonomy in the bulk of the populated hill regions of the West Bank.

King Hussein of Jordan rejected the scheme, while Menachem Begin, the first Likud prime minister, modified it, planting settlements in heavily populated Palestinian areas.

Israelis and Palestinians is a useful primer on the Arab-Israeli conflict. It exposes readers to information generally unavailable in the media and to finely calibrated insights. They will better understand the dispute after wading into this book.

Women must learn to love themselves, event told

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Women should reclaim their self-esteem by embracing their natural beauty, a former beauty consultant and TV personality told a room full of wives, mothers and daughters at the annual Chabad Lubavitch of Markham sisterhood evening last week.

Adrienne Gold, who made her mark on Canadian television as host of the beauty and fashion show Images with Adrienne Gold, spoke about beauty and the media, and about learning to love yourself, using her trademark humour and unabashed honesty.

The event, titled "Women Who Make a Difference," included speeches, a fashion show and a raffle, and it honoured Jeanette Karp, a member of the Chabad of Markham sisterhood, for her charity and volunteer work.

Gold talked about her journey from being a young, self-conscious girl who hid behind makeup and clothes because she thought she was ugly, to a mature, spiritual woman who walked away from a career in television to teach lessons from the Torah to women all over North America.

She recalled her days as a schoolgirl, desperately trying to fit in, all the while trying to draw attention away from herself by creating a distracting visual image.

"I thought if people looked at me and said, 'Look what she's wearing today,' then they wouldn't look at me."

"Many times when you see a woman dressed in an over-the-top, overly erotic way… you need to know that that woman wants to not be seen," Gold said.

"I perfected the look so that no one could see me."

People began to take notice of her fashion sense, which led to a job as a stylist, but what her employers didn't realize was that she was selling tips in distraction, rather than fashion, Gold said.

She told her audience that women shouldn't feel the need to hide behind makeup and clothes.

"When I started to become more religious, the first thing I embraced was modest clothing," she said, adding that she wanted to be seen for who she was and not what she wore.

She said it's unfair for women to compare themselves to 18-year-old models on skincare commercials who represent what the beauty industry thinks a 40-year-old woman should look like.

"The fashion and beauty industry has one motivation. They want you to feel bad about yourself, because if you do, you'll want to buy stuff."

She said that youth and beauty dominate our culture, but the standards are unrealistic.

Gold spoke about shopping with a friend and discovering a piece of clothing with a tag that said "size zero."

"I said, 'What exactly is a zero? Does that mean we are not supposed to exist? Is that progress?'"

Gold said that trying to become a size zero is not only an unhealthy, unrealistic aspiration, it also hinders a woman's chances of fulfilling one of the biggest mitzvahs.

"Women with no body fat cannot fulfill the first mitzvah in the Torah, which is 'Be fruitful and multiply.' You need fat. Women have fat. It is just that simple."

She acknowledged that some women are naturally skinny, but noted they make up only two per cent of the population.

"One of the things that Judaism teaches us about beauty… is that beauty and grace are not lasting."

Rather than obsess about looking young and beautiful, Gold said women should embrace the natural process of aging.

"If you are lucky, you will age. Your skin will betray you. You can shoot yourself full of Botox until next Thursday, but at a certain point, you're going to start to look like Joan Rivers and everyone will know it," Gold said to a chorus of laughter.

"You can get away with it only for so long, so why not stop now?"

She said we need to stop aspiring to be a size zero, "a nothing," and be joyful with who we are.

"One of the things we learn in the Torah is that if you want to maximize pleasure you need to minimize it. Less body, more soul, more joy, more beauty."

CYCLING FOR BAYCREST: Teddy Weinstein, 14, and his grandfather Ron Golden rode a tandem bike in the 10th annual Barrie-to-Baycrest 100-kilometre cycling fundraiser earlier this fall and raised $13,000 for Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's new brain health centre clinics. They were among 138 riders who raised more than $1 million for the clinics, which provide outpatient treatment for disorders such as Alzheimer's and stroke. They are pictured with Marguerite Markowski, a Baycrest resident who hand-painted "thank you" cards for the cyclists.

After decades of exclusion, MDA expects change

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — Magen David Adom (MDA) appears to be on the verge of securing full member status in the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies after close to 60 years of exclusion.

On a recent visit to Israel, Swiss Foreign Minister Micheline Calmy-Rey announced that she would shortly convene a conference at which signatories to the Geneva Conventions would consider an amendment calling for a neutral emblem. That would smooth the way for Israel to shed its observer status in favour of full partnership in the international association.

"It's been long overdue," said Arye Mekel, Israel's consul general in New York. "It's the new and improved atmosphere" following the withdrawal from Gaza.

Arab opposition has shut Israel out of the organization for years. The fledgling Jewish state's candidacy was rejected during the Geneva Conventions in 1949, which insisted that new aid groups adopt the Red Cross emblem.

Among the major stumbling blocks has been Arab and Muslim states' refusal to accept the Magen David as an official symbol, despite the inclusion of the Islamic Red Crescent.

The changes to be discussed early next month in Geneva include the creation of a new, neutral emblem to be used by member states that do not wish to use a cross or crescent. The new symbol would be a red crystal, a square resting on one of its corners.

The MDA – for whom full membership could mean increased funding in addition to resolution of its diplomatic isolation – will be free to display the Magen David either inside or next to the red crystal when its members work abroad.

The MDA has come close to securing membership in the International Red Cross before. Following several decades at arm's length, the group inched closer to the international organization in the late 1990s.

The rapprochement has gained steam with staunch support for MDA from the American Red Cross – which since 2000 has withheld dues to the international body to protest Israel's exclusion – and from the U.S. Congress, which has passed a series of measures demanding that MDA be granted full membership.

"The American Red Cross is a very, very, very strong supporter of the Magen David Adom, and we cherish their help," said Yonatan Yagodovsky, director of the international department of MDA in Israel.

While the recent boost in Israel's image may have helped MDA's cause, Yagodovsky said, the agency's status has been improving for several years. He cited several countries as having been particularly active on Israel's behalf, including the United States, Norway, the United Kingdom, Jordan, France, the Netherlands, Canada, Turkey and Bulgaria.

"The wedding invitations were sent, and I hope that there will be a positive resolution in about two weeks in Geneva," he said.

A working committee was created in 1999 to look into clearing the impasse. An amendment to the International Red Cross' third protocol proposing a symbol that would have allowed Israel to fully join the group's ranks was written, and observers expected it be adopted in October 2000.

When the Palestinian intifadah broke out in September 2000, however, the political situation it created once again stymied MDA's efforts.

The recent Israeli withdrawal from Gaza has met with widespread support around the world, and Israel, Jewish leaders and some European Union and other nations see the current moment as ripe for a deal.

This is "a politically propitious time for Switzerland to convene a diplomatic conference and put forward the third protocol," said Andrew Srulevitch, director of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations' department of international affairs. "On its face, there's no legitimate reason for the MDA to be excluded in principle. It has to be done in a way that is politically feasible."

Since the Gaza pullout, some Muslim countries that previously opposed recognizing the Star of David have signalled a willingness to revisit the issue.

Sources say that Pakistan, which had been a leader in opposing MDA's inclusion but has recently taken several steps toward Israel and the American Jewish community, is now more likely to support the move. Jewish leaders and American officials have raised the issue with Pakistan over the last few months.

Most recently, four U.S. senators – Hillary Clinton, Elizabeth Dole, Chuck Hagel and Joseph Lieberman – sent a letter to Calmy-Rey in support of her decision to convene the conference in December.

Passage of the new measure will affect not only Israel, but also Kazakhstan and Eritrea, which both have significant Muslim and Christian populations and have been reluctant to take on either the red cross or the red crescent symbol.

Observers note that there's no guarantee MDA will be accepted. The move still must be passed by Geneva Conventions signatory nations that include Iran, whose president recently called for Israel to be destroyed.

But the observers note that Switzerland – the depository state of the Geneva Conventions – has been consulting with many of these nations over the last few months, and say it's unlikely the Swiss would call the summit if they weren't convinced the measure would pass.

"We are pretty much at the entrance to the new era," Yagodovsky said.

Austria arrests Irving on Holocaust denial charges

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — Controversial British historian David Irving was arrested on a warrant accusing him of denying the Holocaust, the Austrian Interior Ministry said last Thursday.

Irving was arrested Nov. 11 in the southern province of Styria, said police Maj. Rudolf Golia, a spokesperson for the Austrian Interior Ministry. He was transferred to a prison in Graz.

Irving was detained on a warrant issued in 1989 under Austrian laws that make Holocaust denial a crime, Golia said. The charges stemmed from speeches Irving delivered that year in Vienna and in the southern town of Leoben.

Irving in the past has faced allegations of spreading anti-Semitic and racist ideas. He is the author of nearly 30 books, including Hitler's War, which challenges the extent of the Holocaust.

He remained in custody last week, the Austria Press Agency said. Calls by Ha'aretz to the Graz court to confirm the report went unanswered late last week.

If formally charged, tried and convicted on the charge, Irving could face up to 20 years in prison, said Otto Schneider of the public prosecutor's office. But he said it was unclear whether there were sufficient legal grounds to continue holding Irving on such a charge so many years after the alleged offense was committed.

A decision was expected by the end of this week on how to proceed, Schneider said.

Irving is perhaps best known for losing a libel lawsuit in 2000 he brought against Emory University religion professor Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books, after Lipstadt accused Irving of being a Holocaust denier.

Grunfeld tries to work his magic with the Wizards

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

It shouldn't come as a big surprise that the Washington Wizards made their first playoff appearance in eight years last season, while posting a 20-win improvement over 2003-04, when you consider that Ernie Grunfeld was the team's general manager and president of basketball operations.

The man with 28 years of experience in the NBA as a former player, broadcaster and coach is now widely regarded as one of the the league's top executives. Two trips to the NBA finals, four Eastern Conference final appearances, and 12 playoff berths in 14 seasons would attest to that.

Grunfeld's father, Alex, a Holocaust survivor, always told him to work hard and good things would happen. He's done just that in D.C. and saw the team win its first playoff series since 1983 last spring when the Wizards rallied after losing the first two games of their playoff series to defeat the Chicago Bulls in six games.

Washington was swept by Miami in the second round.

The Wizards lost last season's NBA steals leader Larry Hughes to free agency in the off-season, but Grunfeld compensated by adding Caron Butler, Chucky Atkins, and Antonio Daniels, who he feels make them a much deeper club, while adding a lot more versatility. He says he got three players for the same amount that Hughes would have cost.

Grunfeld, 50, was hired by Washington in June 2003, leaving his job as GM of the Milwaukee Bucks to take over the position previously held by hoops legend Michael Jordan.

"There was an opportunity to build a franchise that had not had that much success over the years," Grunfeld said in an interview prior to the Wizards' game in Toronto earlier this month.

"I wanted to contribute to bringing a new organization a winning tradition there. It's a vibrant town, a good basketball town, and I was excited about that opportunity. My focus is on bringing a winning attitude and environment to Washington."

Born in Satu-Mare, Romania, Grunfeld and his family fled the Communist regime when he was nine years old. During the war, his father Alex had laboured in a Nazi work camp, while his mother Livia avoided the Nazis by carrying false papers and hiding out in basements in Hungary.

Grunfeld was a poor immigrant who spoke no English in Forest Hills, N.Y., where he learned basketball on playground courts. It was there that he developed a competitive streak he would carry with him throughout his playing days.

Only 18 and having just graduated from high school in the summer of 1973, Grunfeld was selected to play for the American team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. Even though he was the youngest player on the squad, he led the team in scoring with 20 points per game. However, the Americans came up short in the championship game, losing to Israel, 86-80.

"It was a very exciting time for me," recalled Grunfeld, whose club was coached by the legendary Harry Litwack of Temple University.

"To represent my country in any kind of international competition, especially with fellow Jewish athletes, was a great thrill for me.

"Winning the gold medal at the 1976 Olympics [in Montreal] was my top highlight, but the Maccabiah experience ranks right along with that."

Grunfeld was also a member of the 1975 United States gold-medal winning team at the Pan American Games.

He played for the University of Tennessee from 1973 to 1977, averaging 22.3 points per game and making the Sporting News All-America second team in 1977. Grunfeld was drafted 11th overall that year by the Milwaukee Bucks and would go on to play in the league for nine seasons.

After two years in Milwaukee, Grunfeld was dealt to the Kansas City Kings. He would play there for three campaigns before signing with the New York Knicks as a free-agent in 1982. Grunfeld retired after four years in the Big Apple, having played 693 career games, averaging 7.4 points per game.

He served as the Knicks radio analyst for the MSG network for three years after his playing career concluded and later took an assistant coaching position with the club before he was promoted to the front office.

During his reign as the Knicks' top personnel executive, New York advanced to the conference semi-finals nine consecutive seasons, had five 50-plus win seasons, won three Atlantic Division championships, and made two trips to the NBA finals, once as an eighth seed.

In 1999, Grunfeld and the Knicks parted company and he moved to Milwaukee, where he spent the next four seasons achieving immediate success. The team won 14 playoff games while he was in charge, exceeding its total in the 12 seasons prior to his arrival.

While Grunfeld's challenge now is in guiding the Wizards to elite status in the NBA's Eastern Conference, he's quietly rooting for his son Dan to one day join him in the world's best basketball league.

Dan Grunfeld's senior season at Stanford University is just getting under way, and he's being touted as an All-American candidate in this, his draft year.

The shooting guard was All Pac-10 last season and led the Cardinal with 18 points per game. He is fully recovered from a knee injury suffered at the end of last year when he was really coming on.

"I think he has a real chance to play in the league," said the senior Grunfeld, who knows a thing or two about what it takes.

"He's a very hard worker and has put himself in a great position to be drafted."

Blind Israeli golfer scores hole-in-one

By DAVID CALIFA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's only blind golfer, Zohar Sharon, now has something else to be proud of, something that every golfer dreams of – a hole-in-one.

After hitting his 7-wood at Caesarea Golf Club's par 3 15th hole, and getting the approval from Shimshon Levy, his caddy and "eyes" on the course, Zohar climbed into his golf cart and the two headed for the green, some 175 yards away. When they got there, however, the ball was nowhere to be seen.

"I probably overshot it," Zohar muttered.

But after a five-minute search that proved futile, Zohar said, "It actually was a pretty good shot. Look in the hole."

When the astonished Levy saw the ball in the hole he shouted, "I'm not touching it. You come and get it."

Zohar Sharon

A hole-in-one is one of golf's holy grails, and millions will spend a lifetime on the course without making one, let alone seeing one. Aside from high-fives from friends and witnesses, slaps on the back from everyone in the clubhouse, and seeing one's name engraved on a brass board, the acer gets the "right" to buy drinks for everyone present.

Bringing out the youth vote

Sandie Benitah
20 Something

Since the sponsorgate scandal broke, little else has occupied the minds of politicos than a looming election and the future of the publicity-plagued Liberals.

The upcoming election will probably be the most-watched Canadian race of the decade, but I'll bet money that young voters in this country will all but ignore it.

It's hard to pinpoint the blame exactly. Sure, the onus is on us to inform ourselves and exercise our right to vote, but it's kind of hard to get motivated when we feel so detached from the issues and the campaign.

In the United States, political interest among youth has never been higher. The Bush/Kerry campaign in the U.S. saw a record voter turnout, especially among young people. Everyone from P. Diddy to Lindsay Lohan jumped on the bandwagon, and suddenly voting was the "it" thing to do.

Maybe war is a sexier issue than buying party support, maybe U.S. President George W. Bush is more of an intriguing soap-opera character than Canadian Prime Minister Paul Martin is, but whatever the case may be, when Kanye West speaks politics, the youth listen. When Opposition leader Stephen Harper speaks, we fall asleep.

And it's too bad really because this is the age when we really start to understand the issues and feel their impact. We're starting to connect the dots between all the rhetoric and our quality of life. When I was 18, I was just happy to be able to vote and that's why I did, but now that the novelty of being a so-called legal adult has worn off, it might take a bit more to get me excited about going to the polls.

It really bothers me to say that young voters need celebrity glitz to get us interested in voting. Yes, we absolutely can be that frivolous, but the fact is, in the States, people spoke directly to the youth and they listened. That is what needs to happen here.

Avril Lavigne probably won't be making public-service announcements in Canada, but somebody has to take it upon themselves to reach out to the younger voter demographic. I'm willing to bet if any of the parties made it a campaign priority to reach out to the elusive 18 to 30 age group, they'd see a difference in their seat count.

One strategy that parties always use, whether it be here or in the States, or in the provincial or federal campaign, is the use of young candidates to try and reach out to young voters. Let me tell you that if I were a 25-year-old candidate, my focus would be on proving myself to the established voters. The last thing I would want to do is attach myself to the young vote for credibility.

Don't give us somebody who just looks like they could be one of us, give us somebody who can turn the issues surrounding international and domestic policies and make them relevant to the stage we are in our lives.

It's difficult to relate to national issues that are as broad and diverse as the country, but just because I don't trade softwood lumber for a living, doesn't mean I won't understand the impact it will have on trade relations and the effect it could have on new businesses young people are starting up every day. Thank goodness our boyfriends and husbands aren't being recruited for war, but I still care about why our armed forces will need more money to help make our grandparents' country a safer place. And I've just begun noticing exactly how much of my hard-earned money is going to taxes and I'd like to understand how a new deal for cities means a new deal for our new paycheques, thank you very much.

Don't you see, we want to listen, we just need someone to talk to us.

ASIAN LATKES WITH GINGERED SOUR CREAM

4 potatoes (2 1/4 lbs)
1/4 cup coarsely chopped cashews
1/4 cup flour
2 tblsp. wasabi powder
2 eggs, beaten
Vegetable oil

Peel and grate potatoes. Drain and squeeze out as much liquid as possible; discard liquid. Mix in nuts, flour, wasabi & eggs. Heat 1 tblsp. oil in large, heavy skillet over medium-high heat. Form batter into silver dollar size patties; fry until golden brown on both sides, adding more oil and adjusting the heat as needed.

Gingered Sour Cream: Stir together 1/2 cup sour cream and 2 tblsp. fresh chopped ginger.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

I recently started dating a new guy. Josh and I were a good fit right from the start. After about two months of frequent dating, Josh invited me over to his parents' home for Friday night dinner.

I was a bit nervous, but felt that it was pretty normal. Josh has a large family. I walked in the door and Josh made the introductions. Everyone was so nice – too nice for me! There were lots of touchy-feely people everywhere, and hugs and kisses, from everyone to everyone. It went on all evening. It was far too overwhelming for me. I didn't grow up in a touchy-feely home. Josh didn't notice how uncomfortable I was, and the last thing I want to do is insult his family, but all this physical stuff is too much for me. Is there a graceful way I can handle this?

Too Touchy

Dear Too Touchy

It sounds like you're involved with someone who was brought up in a very warm and loving family.

Your discomfort is not unusual. We all have physical and emotional boundaries. Most people need a physical comfort zone of about three feet. Emotional boundaries are much harder to define and are different for every person.

You were raised in a family that respected each member's personal space and did not often cross those boundaries. Josh comes from a family with completely different dynamics. It's very different from yours, but not any less normal or accepted.

It's just a matter of easing you into his family. This calls for a discussion with Josh. Tell him how much you enjoyed his family, but that the experience was eye-opening and that they are very different from what you're used to. If you describe to Josh the type of family you were raised in, maybe he can help integrate you into his family at a more comfortable pace.

Open discussions such as this can bring the two of you even closer together. Being part of an affectionate family can only enrich your life. Open your mind, embrace your situation. You will grow and learn as a person.

The angst of an Israeli parent

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The day has arrived somewhere in Be'er Sheva, Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and other cities, towns and villages in Israel, when an 18-year-old son or daughter is leaving his or her home to begin service in the army.

This exact moment has been in the minds of his or her parents since their child came into the world. Maybe the Israeli mother and father had a few days, maybe a week or a month to celebrate the most miraculous period in their lives – but sooner than later the worry set in.

A few weeks ago, a North American oleh, a friend, currently living in Toronto, showed me a picture of a 20-year-old chayal (soldier) – Yonathan Evron – who was murdered by Hamas in the West Bank. The young man had been a childhood friend of the oleh's son, and my friend was oh so sad.

He told me that indeed from the first morning that his beloved offspring headed out the front door, hugged and kissed the entire family and then walked away with a khaki bag slung over his shoulder, his heart sang with pride, but his gut ached with anxiety.

My friend explained that life as a chayal is perilous, and for those boys who serve in combat positions – as his son did in Hebron – the danger of becoming a casualty is constant and not a moment passes when they do not contemplate their son's well-being.

"Part of you is always with them, and it is almost impossible to lose yourself in something [like a book or movie]. Time slows down," he said.

So when my friend read that the chayal was murdered, and a visibly melancholy feeling framed his eyes, I asked him what the strongest thought and image was in his mind. He responded, "This could have been my son, and I'm wondering what his parents must be going through knowing they have lost the most precious thing in their world – a son, in the defence of the Jewish people and Israel."

My heart broke for my friend and the parents of the deceased teen and for all Israeli parents who one morning looked through their blinds and spotted an Israeli officer walking up to their building – hoping they would not knock on their door; for every Israeli man and woman who ever created a baby – knowing one day they might find themselves against their doorpost, courageously smiling and waving goodbye to the child they once rocked in their arms.

Our Israeli brothers and sisters can be tough and lack the cordial Canadian demeanour we are used to. They may be louder than we want them to be – but after all who could blame them. As my friend said, "We must never forget that the entire security of the Jewish people lies on the shoulders of these boys." Imagine the stress. Imagine their fear.

Although Israelis rarely communicate their feelings about this heavy burden they bear, or give us a glimpse of their pain, it is clear that Israel and its population live in a tortured world of constant anxiety worried sick about the health, safety and lives of their little one who grew up far too quickly, learned how to shoot an M16 and often become a target in the cross hairs of our enemies.

We in the Diaspora owe these families enormous gratitude for their willingness to suffer so greatly and often sacrifice the lives of their children for the safety of the Jewish people everywhere and the State of Israel.

Make sure your band's in tune with you

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

From table settings to dance tunes, every aspect of a party contributes to a good time for your guests. For most people, though, no form of art or expression affects them more directly and powerfully than music, so the band you hire is crucial. Choose the band with care and make sure they're in tune with you.

Jordan Klapman

Mark Kopman, versatile leader of the After Midnight Band (416-789-2828), is also the band's lead vocalist, and plays keyboard and rhythm guitar. Jordan Klapman is leader of Klapman's Klezmer Band and the Jordan Klapman Orchestra (416-588-0854; website www.jordanklapman.com); and he has a wealth of knowledge on all forms of Jewish music.

Klapman says his klezmer band is a "subset" of the orchestra. Even when hired for klezmer, he's often asked to play other genres: jazz, pop, swing, soft rock, waltzes, circle dances, traditional Israeli, chassidic and Sephardi.

Along with up-tempo tunes, Klapman plays some quiet, even meditative songs, varying the mood. His repertory includes "tisch" melodies, background music to go with dinner. The music fits what's going on at the moment.

It's often hard to categorize songs by genre. Klapman – who gives lectures on the history of Jewish music – cites the example of Bei mir bistu schoen. "People think it's a folk tune," he says, "but it was written by Sholom Secunda, as a swing tune for Yiddish theatre.

"Many folk songs don't originate as folk. They become folk tunes, in a way, because so many people know them and sing them.

"Jews created Broadway," Klapman points out, "and influenced the songs of social protest. There's continuity from 19th-century social activist entertainers like Mark Varshavsky and Eliakum Zunser to Woody Guthrie, Theodor Bikel and Bob Dylan. Personalities as diverse as Al Sherman and Lenny Bruce are in a direct line from those Old Country entertainers."

Like other genres of popular music, klezmer is still evolving. "There are new tunes being written," says Klapman, "so I'm never going to run out of klezmer repertory."

Kopman points out that besides specializing in genres, bands also specialize in the kinds of events they play. After Midnight, for example, does mainly weddings and corporate events.

Kopman likes to be versatile: he has a wide repertory and continually adds to his playlist. "Clients look at the list," he says, "check off the songs they like, cross out the no-no's, and add requests of their own. At every event, about four songs get added to the list. Often, they become part of our regular repertory.

"We'll never have a shortage of new songs. And often, we rediscover numbers which are good, but have been half forgotten over time."

Kopman stays true to the artists whose songs his band performs. "If we're playing a Van Morrison tune," he states, "we're going to sound like Van Morrison. If we're playing CCR [Creedence Clearwater Revival], we sound like CCR. We don't want to sound like a wedding band – we want you to hear the original artist."

For Kopman, a good live performance is interactive, with synergy between band and crowd. "Music," he says, "isn't as transitory as people sometimes think. Long after the last song is played, people remember having a good time. And I like to end the evening with a long, strong power set."

Klapman and Kopman are alike in their enthusiasm for their work and their strong professional ethic. They also have some good ideas on how to choose the band for your special event.

If you're choosing a band, Kopman urges you to hear them live. "Videotape and audio are useful," he says, "but they're no substitute for being there." You can stand in a corner to hear a few songs, dressed in upper-casual clothes, and listen unobtrusively. Klapman shares Kopman's view of the limits of things like video and demo tapes, pointing out that tapes can be altered.

On one point, though, Klapman has a different take on choosing a band. "Hearing them live is good," he agrees, "but they may not be playing the kind of music you want for your event. It's more like a snapshot of the band.

"Also, every venue has a different acoustic. A good band will take this into account and adapt to it."

Both Kopman and Klapman advise you to pay a lot of attention to references and listen to your friends' recommendations. If several former clients speak well of a band, they're probably good.

Get your child's input when planning a party

By HARRISON JORDAN
Special to The CJN

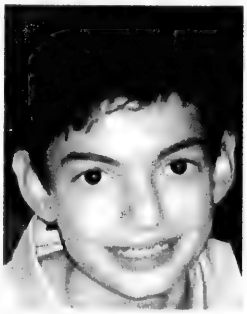
As you glance at The CJN's party supplement, you might be dreading having to plan your child's bar or bat mitzvah.

You'll have to meet with the caterer, consultant, printer and florist, not to mention the photographer and all the other people who will be involved in your kid's party.

However, with the help of your child, you can relieve some of your stress.

Kids have many opportunities to help out and plan their special day, and I think it's entirely appropriate that kids plan their bar or bat mitzvah.

After all, it's their event.



Harrison Jordan

Here are some tips on how your kid can help out.

First, at the printer, you and your child can pick out a few designs for place cards and invitations. You can then narrow the list down to one design that you both like.

Usually you are given a catalogue of invitations and place-card designs, but if you don't find a design that you or your child like, you can shell out a little extra cash for a custom design.

The process is somewhat fun for children, because they can mix and match fonts, colours and designs.

When you meet with the caterer, you are presented with menus of food to chose from. If you're lucky, the caterer might even show you some food being prepared.

At the catering meetings you, the parents, have to figure out the floor plan, how many kids and adults there are going to be, and most of all, choose the menu items.

My parents picked the items on the adult menu, and they let me choose what I wanted for the kids' and the vegetarian menu. Another choice you have to make is whether to choose the basic linen the caterer offers or rent specialty linen from a linen supplier, who can provide samples of appropriate linens that you think might suit your bar a bat mitzvah.

You will also need to meet with a photographer if you would like to capture your party memories on film and video. The photographer can photograph or videotape your event, depending on your needs.

If you're having a DJ at your party, you must meet with him to discuss the type of songs you want to be played – a task you can leave to your kid.

Let's face it: kids can't plan their whole bar or bat mitzvah all by themselves, but they can attend the meetings with their parents and give their input.

Harrison Jordan, age 13, is a student at Crestwood Preperatory College in Toronto. Along with his parents, he helped organize his bar mitzvah, which was held Nov. 19 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Keeping in tune

"Word of mouth gets us most of our business," Kopman says, "but we need print ads as well. It's print ads that establish our presence in the community, letting people know we're 'out there.'"

Both Kopman and Klapman agree that the ideal band leader is one who makes suggestions, but listens to you. After all, it's your party.

For Klapman, the greatest compliment a party host can give him is, "You played at the volume I like. We could dance, or we could have a conversation if we wanted to." As Klapman puts it: "If you have to yell to be heard, your ears are being damaged."

Oh, and one last thing: don't leave it too long when you book your band. "Sooner is better than later," Klapman advises you. "Six months to a year is ideal."

Enjoy your simchah in the height of luxury

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Location, location, location. It's an important factor when planning a simchah, too, although there are many other things to consider. The right venue can make a simchah memorable. Hotels are ideal for sophisticated affairs, and one of the most elegant in the Greater Toronto Area is the Park Hyatt Hotel (416-925-1234) in Yorkville. At the northwest corner of Bloor Street and Avenue Road, it is also close to many of the city's downtown activities.

Stephanie Carpenter, director of public relations for the Hyatt, explains that the Yorkville location is one of the Hyatt hotel chain's exclusive luxury hotels. In 1999, the company did a major renovation. "Even in the past few years, we've done more work.The hotel is stunning."

The Park Hyatt is the luxury division. There are only 23 hotels in this category around the world and only eight in North America, Carpenter says. "We are catering to the high-end leisure and business traveller."

She notes that within the hotel, there are two main venue options for parties – the Roof Salon, which can accommodate up to 120 for a sit-down dinner with a dance floor, and the Queen's Park Ballroom, which can seat 320 for lunch or dinner.

Carpenter says the Roof Salon is ideal for a more intimate gathering. "It's fabulous. [It] is on the 18th floor and has the most incredible view of the skyline. It also has a small wrap-around terrace.

"In the wintertime, the fireplace adds to the warmth of the room. It adds wonderful ambiance. It's a popular venue for weddings, bar mitzvahs and engagement parties.

"It's very elegant and a wonderful venue for lunch. You have a view of Lake Ontario. It's just as popular for lunch as it is for evening affairs. In the evening it's beautifully lit."

The room can also be divided for smaller functions. "If you desire 20 people to 120 people, it's a great venue for a cocktail reception."

The ballroom can seat 320 for dinner while allowing for a "nice size" dance floor and podium, or it can hold a cocktail reception for 400 to 450 people, Carpenter says.

"We just did a wedding in the ballroom. The room is unbelievable."

She notes that the ballroom can also be divided into different sections or into smaller rooms, so that people can mingle without having to compete with the music.

"We can put the DJ at one end of the ballroom We can set up quieter areas for adults to be able to talk to each without being drowned out by the music."

The hotel boasts a kosher (COR) kitchen under the direction of the accomplished executive chef Joan Monfaredi, who works closely with a mashgiach. "She can create any menu style," Carpenter says. "She can create an eight-course dinner or beautiful stand-up stations."

Quieter areas for adults

Kosher dinners start at $70 per person.

Carpenter says Michael Rosen, the new director of catering, works closely with the clients because every event is customized.

While there is no charge for renting the room for the main event, additional rooms for a wedding ceremony or a bar mitzvah service start at $500.

Weddings held at the Park Hyatt include a complementary deluxe guest room for the bride and groom complete with VIP amenities such as champagne and chocolate.

The hotel offers luxury services that include a 24-hour concierge, valet parking and in-room dining. she says.

"If you want a bowl of matzah ball soup at four in the morning, it will be there.

"All rooms have fine Italian linens and duvets, and feather pillows if desired. And there are high-end bath amenities."

Hotel guests and bridal parties can also get spa treatments and take advantage of the facilities at the hotel's day spa, a 10,000-square-foot space with 17.treatment rooms, a tea lounge, whirlpools and sauna.

"The Stillwater Spa is recognized as the best spa in the city and one of two in Canada rated by the Mobil Travel Guide," says Carpenter.

"We accommodate bridal groups often. Brides and grooms especially love to book the couple's massage room, with two massage tables, two masseurs and a hot tub.

"It's great for newlyweds. They get the massage room for an hour and a half. After the massage – which lasts an hour – they can soak in some peaceful moments after the big day."

Zap Zone and Playdium offer fun for kids and adults

By JENNIFER THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

Looking for a unique way to entertain? Planning a birthday party, corporate event or another special occasion?

Zap Zone Laser Tag and Fun Centre, located in Concord, Ont., and Playdium, in Mississauga, are two venues that offer fun and enjoyment for children of all ages.

Zap Zone Laser Tag and Fun Centre (905-761-1115) bills itself as the ultimate place to play. This venue offers an energized environment, and with more than 7,000 square feet of playing space, it can provide a full day of fun and excitement.

Playdium caters to children of all ages.

When asked why Zap Zone has become so successful, spokesperson Anthony Strageldin says his venue appeals to children of all ages.

"One week we may have a birthday party for a group of five-year-olds and the next day, we may have a corporate group of 40-year-olds."

Zap Zone offers two distinct attractions for its guests.

Laser tag is played in a multi-maze arena. Teams of players with futuristic laser vests are pitted against each other in a glow-in-the-dark environment filled with fog, music and ruby laser beams.

Teams run through a darkened twisted smoke filled maze of walls, ramps and platforms against two other teams in a simulation right out of the movies.

Zap Zone also offers an extensive arcade, in which players can collect points that they can redeem for toys and prizes.

Sarah Ewels of Playdium in Mississauga (905-273-4810) says her venue also caters to children of all ages.

With 40,000 square feet featuring more than 200 of the world's most challenging games, simulators and attractions, Playdium is a high-tech, interactive entertainment centre.

Playdium has both indoor and outdoor attractions, including one of the most challenging and longest go-kart tracks in Canada, a unique 18-hole miniature golf course designed exclusively for Playdium, and a "Sports Dome" that features state-of-the-art attractions such as batting cages and bowling.

Zap Zone offers an extensive arcade.

Both venues provide a full day of fun and cater to your every need.

Playdium offers a wide range of food and refreshments so you never have leave the game floor. There is also a fully licensed bar and lounge when it's time to refuel. Food and refreshments at Zap Zone are catered, and food – such as birthday cakes and pizza – can be ordered entirely kosher.

Both venues offer group packages for any event, which you can customize and design yourself.

Flowers may be the most important part of an event

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A bride should always be comfortable with her florist, because flowers are just as important for the wedding day as anything else, said Fran Sackler of Fran Sackler Floral Designs.

Sackler, who has been working out of her home for the past 40 years, said the process of decorating a wedding requires a lot of time, hard work and patience, but as long as she is able to give the bride what she wants, it's all worth it.

"I try to guide them in a way that they want the wedding to be, and also in a way that it will look the best," she said.

"I'm like the Ann Landers of flowers. I don't want to call myself Martha Stewart, because I hate her," Sackler said with a laugh.

This year alone, Sackler has decorated 50 weddings, but she keeps striving to make each event the best it can be.

"It's intimidating, because you can't rest on your laurels. Everything has to be perfect every time."

She said what separates her arrangement from others is that she learned her craft in England and much of what she does is in the "old style."

"Most of the bouquets are wired and taped. They are put together in a structured bouquet. It's a little more unique and a little more formal," she said.

"So many people have told me that they haven't seen work like mine," Sackler said. "It takes a lot of hard work, but the outcome is always gorgeous."

Sackler added that while most brides have a specific idea of what they want, she'll always be completely honest with her clients.

Although the latest trend is for brides to choose bright colours such as hot pink and orange, Sackler will try to convince them that subtler colours are more appropriate.

"I try to steer brides clear of using bright colours," she said, adding that a bright bouquet takes the focus away from the bride and her dress.

While Sackler said she is very professional and dedicated when it comes to delivering on her promises, she explained that working from home gives her clients the impression of informality and takes the pressure off.

"If I'm making supper when they come over and they're hungry, I'll feed them. I try to make the wedding flower-choosing experience as fun as possible."

She suggests that to be safe, brides should consider booking a florist anywhere from six to 12 months in advance of their wedding.

For brides who want a florist who can decorate a hall with more than flowers, Karen Baker of Designs by Karen Baker may be the right choice.

Aside from flower arrangements, Baker also provides draping, and fabrics of all colours and textures for tables and chairs.

Baker, who has been decorating special events for 20 years, said she likes to give her clients exactly what they are looking for.

"I want people to walk into a room and see exactly what they pictured in their heads."

She said the hottest colours right now seem to be greens and chocolate browns, but she is also starting to see a resurgence in an '80s trend of using black and white for special events.

Baker recalled an event that featured green and burnt orange as its main colours.

"People are looking to be more vibrant. My clients have become a little more adventurous, and I think it's wonderful," she said.

"There is just so much out there and there are so many different ideas."

To contact Sackler, call 905-884-5848. To reach Baker, call 905-886-8100.

Fine dining is alluring on its own, but the venue and its various accoutrements make the complete package, says Raphy Amar of Gladstone's Wine Bar & Grill.

"When you walk into Gladstone's (416-487-9500 or www.gladstones.ca) there's a lavish staircase that goes to the mezzanine, two private dining rooms, a lounge with a fireplace and a massive bar," Amar says.

"When you put it all together, that's what makes Gladstone's."

With ambiance as a focus, Gladstone's places presentation as a priority for both surroundings and food.

"Presentation is formidable," Amar says. "It has to look beautiful."

As a restaurant, Gladstone's is a glatt kosher steakhouse that also serves a Sunday brunch.

"We offer four kinds of different steaks that vary in size from 16 to 24 ounces," Amar says, noting prime rib is also available.

"For those who don't eat beef, you've got an incredible selection of fishes, like sea bass and crusted pistachio salmon."

Amar adds that a sushi bar will soon be part of the appetizer mix.

Sunday brunch, which runs from 10:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m., includes salads, waffle and crepe stations, teriyaki salmon, chicken and a diverse sweet table.

For private functions, Amar invites clients to work with him in creating menus that suit their culinary desires.

"The standard menu is available, but we can create custom menus according to their needs," he says.

"When we sit down for a second appointment, we will finalize the menu."

Similarly, clients have a choice in how they arrange the seating setup.

The facility's main floor seats about 110 and the two private dining rooms are designed for collective seating of 100.

Gladstone's main floor seats around 110, and the two private dining rooms are designed for around 100.

"If you have a cocktail party, you can fit 350 people and we've done that," Amar says.

The restaurateur notes Gladstone's staff will work collaboratively with florists, musicians and anyone else involved in putting together private parties.

"When it comes to the décor and music, we'll let the co-ordinator or client choose who they want and let them come in," he says.

Amar encourages clients to book well in advance.

"We will book two years in advance," he says.

"The sooner, the better, to lock up the venue."

Quality clothes at bargain prices

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Walking through the mall can be an overwhelming feeling. Store racks overflow with today's throwaway fashions, and all the soul of the industry seems to have disappeared.

This leads me to believe that the motto of today is quantity over quality. But if it's quality you are searching for, both Tom's Place and Emmanuel Bitini offer just that.

Tom's Place (416-596-0297) sells a wide variety of high-end men and women's clothing at affordable prices. "We cater to the wealthy, the middle class and the not so wealthy," says Tom Mihalik, the store's owner. "Everyone can shop at Tom's Place."

Mihalik's father opened the business, in Kensington Market, in 1958 as a used clothing and furniture store. The store dressed its customers in the finest suits and tuxedos they could find.

"We always believed in suits, and making men look great," Mihalik says. When the store burnt down in the late 1960s, because of some hippies getting a little carried away with candle-making, it moved to its current location in the market and has been selling high-fashion clothing ever since.

Tom's Place sells designer clothing at reduced prices. Made up of mainly formal and semi-casual wear, the store's selection is something to be admired. The store carries thousands of suits, so as to fit each and every customer. With such an assortment, how could they not!

Tom Mihalik of Tom's Place.

Mihalik makes sure that the store is on top of current clothing trends. He even travels to Europe and the United States yearly to keep up on the trends. "We are today's newspaper – we don't get left behind," he says.

Mihalik observes that a classic tailored look is one of today's most important trends and two-button suits and slim silhouettes are all the rage at the store.

The vibrancy of Kensington can be felt throughout the whole store. "There's a lot of history here – this is where I grew up," says Mihalik.

"It was always my dream to sell beautiful clothes here. How could I not be thrilled to go to work every day?"

The store is also widely known for its deals. "You can haggle with us and we'll usually give it to you," he says.

Another option for fantastic designer clothing at discounted prices is Emmanuel Bitini (416-782-3211), which has two locations. Since the late 70s, Emmanuel Bitini has been offering the best in women's clothing.

Catering to all women who appreciate beautiful fashions, Emmanuel Bitini carries everything from day and evening suits to evening gowns and casual wear, all at discounts up to 70 percent. The store carries such brands as Jones, Louben and CYC. The selection offered is so large that there is most certainly something for everyone. "There is so much to choose from here," says André Abitbol, the store's owner.

He cites sheer blouses and dressy skirts as some of the great trends offered in the store. In keeping with current colour trends, a gorgeous array of browns, pinks and greens dominate the store. The store receives new trendy items so often that you will hardly see the same thing twice.

"We are very excited when we get new shipments," says Abitbol. In such a lively high-fashion environment, it'd be impossible to be bored. "I really love the excitement of fashion changes – it just fills the store."

If you crave a fabulous shopping experience that will fill your closet with fashions galore, heading to Tom's Place or Emmanuel Bitini might just be right for you. With all the hottest trends at equally hot prices, these clothiers have got it all. No longer must you run through the mall with that glazed-over look in your eyes – these stores are here just for you.

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Keeping party guests in a festive mood throughout an affair requires creative forms of entertainment.

On-site photo booths are one increasingly popular option for weddings and bar mitzvahs.

"Photo booth pictures are nice souvenirs for the guests... as well as for the [party hosts] to remember every guest by," says Hosam Khirala of HM Entertainment.

"It's great for all ages, old and young."

Unlike the large booths that are popular in malls, HM Entertainment's booths are comparatively light and transportable, making them easy to set up in any type of location.

"Before the event, I go to the function site to do an inspection, so I can decide where I will put the machine," Khirala says.

He notes clients can book the booths for either three- or five-hour packages.

In one hour, 20 strips can be produced in colour or black and white, depending on your preference. Caricatures are also available.

Inside the booth, partygoers can pose for four different shots.

Photo prints can be customized to include a design in line with a party's décor, or perhaps to include a personalized thank-you message from the person who the party is for.

Because doubles are always printed, picture can also be included in a scrapbook, which HM can put together as a keepsake.

"In the scrapbook, the guest can write some notes... so at the end of the night, [the party hosts] have a nice book of everyone that attended their function," Khirala says.

To contact HM Entertainment, call toll free at 1-866- 877-3041 or visit www.hmfun.com.

Caricatures can be permanent party mementos

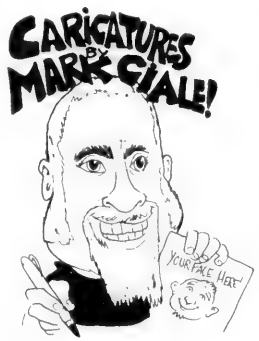
By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you give a party, you want to offer your guests something special, something unique. Why not give them a chance to see an artist in action – and take home a unique piece of art? If treated well, a caricature can be a permanent memento of a party.

"A big caricature on illustration board," says caricaturist Mark Ciale (416-929-6678; www.markciale.com), "makes a fine corporate present or bar mitzvah signing board. This gives you a durable memento of the party." Keepsakes such as this, he says, give his work some permanence, and help him generate more business.

Ciale and caricaturist Chris Klein (416-391-3774) have distinctive styles. What they share, is a serious, professional approach to their work and a readiness to advise you on choosing a caricaturist for your party.

What is the difference, though, between a caricature and a cartoon? Many people would equate them.



"A cartoon," Klein says, "is anything humorous, whereas a caricature is a portrait. A cartoon might be no more than two dots and a line for a mouth, like the 'happy face.' But with a caricature, if you know the subject, you should be able to recognize them. Of course, there's a continuum between cartoon and caricature."

"Caricature is related to cartooning," says Ciale, "but more concerned with the rendering of a person's features, though they are often exaggerated for comic effect."

Klein aims at creating a caricature that is "cute, bringing out a person's unique features. My caricatures exaggerate, but in a complimentary way," he says. A party guest with "big hair," for example, might find the size of her hair exaggerated.

"A caricaturist has to 'read' a person quickly," says Klein, whose humorous portraits take about five minutes to complete. "I have to be a bit of a mind reader, to gauge what they're proud of, and where they're sensitive.

"Observing never becomes routine," he continues. "I don't ever want to fall into a formula – say, repeating the same nose shapes in drawing after drawing. I focus on the person I'm portraying, and each caricature is an interpretation. There are no exact copies. Every artist picks out what he considers important and filters out the rest."

Ciale does work that is light and fun, but portrait-like, making the person recognizable. He favours bold, deliberate strokes to express a great deal in as few lines as possible, and draw an immediate response from the viewer.

A good caricaturist is versatile. Ciale uses both finer and heavier lines to good effect. He also has a vivid imagination, and likes to put his subject in a scene or background.

Klein says that most serious caricaturists have a background in art studies, as well as practical experience. The professional training teaches you to observe, and render what you see. "If it's your work, people take you more seriously than if it's a hobby. My 14 years' experience in the field counts."

Ciale, too, recommends choosing someone with sound professional training and varied practical experience. He studied fine art at the Ontario College of Art (now the Ontario College of Art and Design), and has been doing caricatures for 15 to 16 years at all kinds of events, mainly bar and bat mitzvahs. He works at any kind of party, from picnics to year-end office bashes.

Klein's caricatures take about five minutes per person.

Caricature by Chris Klein.

Ciale says he can draw 12-15 people per hour. "But I like to schmooze a bit while I work.

"Not everyone at a party wants a caricature, but many who don't want one, like to watch the artist at work. They're amazed that someone can create a recognizable likeness of a person in just a few minutes."

And there's almost no type of event where an artist like Klein or Ciale would be out of place. "I'm a hit at bar/bat mitzvahs," Ciale says, "because kids love being drawn. It keeps them from running around aimlessly while the adults are chatting and having pre-dinner cocktails. They slow down to watch me, and become quieter."

He also sees his presence as an icebreaker. Strangers cluster around the artist, and find things to say to one another. This is especially important at a large affair, where many of the guests don't know each other.

"Inquire early about a caricaturist," Ciale advises. "People book months ahead. And you'll want to allow some lead time before you book."

Plan a wedding without all the legwork

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For those who like to shop around when planning a big event such as a wedding, VenueSource.ca and the Wedding Company are two services that can make the process much easier.

Catherine Lash, founder of the Wedding Company, is also a wedding photographer and has been in the business of organizing wedding trade shows for five years.

"I would go to these weddings [as a photographer] and I would meet all these great vendors who didn't have a voice."

From this realization came her ambition to create a service that would benefit both vendors and consumers.

"Our goal is to make the wedding planning process easier in a more sophisticated and mature atmosphere," she said.

The 2006 Wedding Show, which is set for Jan. 20 to 22 at the Carlu in Toronto, will feature 90 vendors that have been handpicked by Lash and her team, as well as seminars such "Where, When, Why, What... and How to Register."

"I always want to make sure they're experienced and talented," Lash says of the vendors, "and I want to create a beautiful atmosphere for couples planning a wedding."

She said what separates her business from others is that her company both organizes a trade show and provides a website that allows people to do their research from home. Most similar companies only do one or the other.

Lash sends out weekly newsletters on Mondays that provide short descriptions of a new service or product that she thinks people would be interested in checking out.

They also feature tips such as "How to get your guests home safe," because many people drink alcohol at festive celebrations.

She said the best part about her service is that it's accessible to anyone because you don't have to subscribe to find the information you need on the website.

She said that the show is enjoyed by all, not just brides.

"The grooms really enjoy the show, too, because it's sophisticated and it's not just catered to the bride."

But if planning a wedding or special event without having to leave the comfort of your home is more appealing to you, VenueSource.ca can be very helpful by providing listings of different locations.

Jonathan Fruitman, VenueSource.ca's director of sales and marketing, is very proud of the one-year-old company's free service.

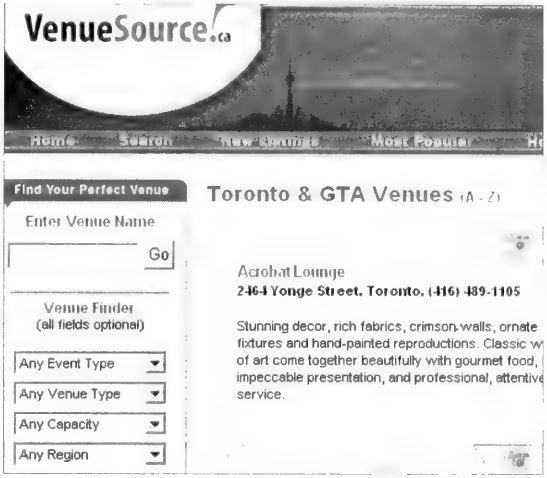
He said he is thankful for the support the company received from event planners at Up and Coming Events, who helped VenueSource.ca become the reliable service it is today.

"It's amazing how far the site has come after only one year. We owe many thanks to the venues who loved the concept and jumped on board with us right from the start," Fruitman said.

VenueSource.ca is a great tool for anyone searching for a place to throw a party, whether it's a wedding, corporate event or just a special night out.

"You can browse through all the different venues and view photos, virtual tours, contact information – virtually everything you need to know," Fruitman said.

"All you do is visit our website, select the type of event you're having, the type of venue you're looking for... and VenueSource.ca will recommend the venues that match your criteria."



VenueSource.ca, top, is a great tool for anyone searching for a place to throw a party. The Wedding Company, left, has been organizing wedding trade shows for five years.

He added that searches can even be narrowed down by which venues have kosher catering, outdoor areas, wheelchair accessibility and free parking.

This season's important fashion trends

By RANDI BERGMAN

The current turnover of trends is so rapid, that they are almost growing exponentially by the second. With such a quick fashion wheel to follow, it's no wonder the mall is full of clueless drones all wondering, "Why is everyone laughing at my Uggs?"

For those of you who have a hard time keeping up with the Sienna Millers of the world, I've laid out the four most important trends of this season and how to wear them in the most fashionable of fashions. Wondering how to stand out from the rest? Here's a little hint... individuality. No matter how hot your outfit is, only that little personal oomph will make it copy-worthy.

Modernly Mod

Once again, trendsetters have gotten in their time machines and leaped back to the 1960s. However, this season, design labels like Proenza Schouler and Miu Miu are doing this decade with a twist. No longer does going mod mean donning a pair of Mary Janes and bright tights. This season, it's a more subdued version of Twiggy that will catching our eye. Dresses are still short and the patterns are heavily geometric, but the colours are rich and jewel-like. This season's muse cleverly adds cowboy boots to complete the look, and she is effervescently cool in her sea of bangles.

Anna Karenina

This season does the elegance of Russian history justice, delving into the folkloric culture as well as high-class sophistication. The extravagant fur hats previously only associated with the Siberian cold have made their way onto the runways in full force. The hats, paired with some of the most gorgeous outfits in precious emeralds, purples and blues, filled Anna Sui and Matthew Williamson runways. Bringing this style into your everyday wardrobe is as easy as incorporating the folkloric patterns into your ski-lodge sweaters or slipping an abnormally large cocktail ring on your perfectly manicured finger. Above all, this trend reminds you to treat yourself to the lushest life possible.

Wuthering Heights

The beauty of winter's snowflakes will only be rivalled by this season's lace, silk and velvet. These stunningly feminine fabrics, found in ruffled collars and skirt trimmings to blazers, appear everywhere. It's a look that's done best by Chloe and Chanel. Pair a lace camisole with a cashmere cardigan to create a little love potion of your own. Bonus marks for adding knee-length leather or suede boots. The romance of the season may even overcome the sharpest of cynics.

Back in Black

Once again, the pendulum has swung back and black dominates this fall. Headed by Rochas and Marc Jacobs, the fascination with black continues to be translated in a myriad of different ways. From minimalist black office suits and trenchcoats to elaborately silk and feathered gowns, black is always dramatic. Black is pervasive in all the aforementioned trends as well. This season, the more volume the better while considering this classic shade. To make your natural beauty really pop, pair your black with crimson lips.

Banquet halls now top choices as wedding venues

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Weddings never go out of style, but where they take place often does. According to two party planners, synagogue and hotel weddings are out, but banquet halls are in.

"People want change. They're looking for different halls, different scenery and different backgrounds for their pictures," says Albert Massaro, general manager of King Solomon's Table.

Tina Katz, general manager at Casa Loma, agrees. "People are getting away from the hotel settings. We have gardens, free parking and so many catering options."

Both Massaro and Katz know what they're talking about. Katz has been booking weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs at the legendary Casa Loma (416-923-1171) for 12 years, while Massaro is starting to cater events at the newer Pearson Convention Centre (905-494-0444).

While both can be classified as banquet halls, that's where the similarities end. For starters, Pearson can hold 2,000 people, while Casa Loma holds about 180 in its main room.

Fortunately, for Pearson party-goers, you don't have to invite your entire community to fill the space – just cut the room in half.

"You can have any combination of whatever you want, but the hall itself is split with six dividers. You can do combinations of each of the different room sizes," says Massaro.

Even if six functions are going simultaneously Pearson's will make sure you won't be doing the horah to someone else's band.

"The walls are completely soundproof," says Massaro. "You can have dancing in one hall and the people in the adjacent halls won't be able to hear you."

Casa Loma, however, doesn't need soundproof walls. There's room for only one function at a time.

"We book out the castle exclusively for an event," says Katz. "They have the whole main floor and three main rooms. One is a great hall, which is where the reception is, and the library is for dinner and dancing. We also have a conservatory, which is for sweet tables and coffee. You can even open the other floors for touring."

Casa Loma also has free parking and the Terrace Gardens – a great place for taking pictures says Katz – while Pearson has a large outdoor patio and space for an outdoor chupah.

Thanks to Pearson's owners' deep pockets, says Massaro, the banquet hall has much to offer.

"When the owners constructed the hall, money was not an object. There are very high ceilings, exquisite mouldings and different kinds of lighting. There are beautiful chandeliers and a large foyer where you can have hors d'oeuvres."

Besides stunning esthetics, both places offer kosher catering options. However, Katz says that 80 per cent of Casa Loma's customers use their in house, non-kosher caterers.

"Zuchter Burk and GMB do kosher catering and both have been with us for a number of years," says Katz. "We do get quite a few requests for kosher catering, or clients need a few kosher meals, but we do most of our catering in-house."

At Pearson, Massaro's King Solomon's Table is the exclusive kosher caterer. The fine-dining kosher restaurant has done smaller-scale simchahs in the past, but Massaro says many of his customers were looking for a more upscale location for their functions.

Banquet halls offer a change of scenery and background

"A lot of our clientele wanted to do simchahs in halls. They asked us if we had a venue where they could have a large function that wasn't in a restaurant setting. Also, Pearson wanted to have a kosher kitchen. A couple of their salesmen had heard of our restaurant. They tasted some of our meals and they gave us an exclusive contract on the spot."

Massaro says that people have more food options now than ever before. And, he adds, choice is exactly what people want.

"People want to have diversity. They're tired of your regular chicken dinner. They want something different."

To accommodate customers' changing tastes, King Solomon's Table has had to think out of the box and create their own, original dishes.

"We've developed a few dishes that are very popular right now. Instead of doing the regular run-of-the-mill chicken breast, we'll do a macadamia chicken. If they want something different, our head chef is very innovative and can accommodate all of the different tastes and budgets."

Katz notices some new catering trends as well. She says a lot of wedding cakes take their cues from Martha Stewart.

"In terms of wedding cakes, cupcakes are very popular, cupcake-type wedding cakes. People will come and say I got this from Martha Stewart. Comfort food is becoming popular again. Chocolate fountains are in. A lot of clients are going with that for bar mitzvahs. Integrating different ethnic cuisines, like a sushi station… is popular, too."

Food's not the only thing that's changed during Katz's dozen years on the job. She says a lot of people are abandoning weekend functions and instead having a wedding or party on a weekday.

"People are booking a lot of weekday weddings," she says. "Tuesdays and Thursdays are popular. People are not going with the traditional."

"Why does a wedding have to be on a Sunday night?" says Massaro. "Just because historically our parents got married on Sundays? I don't think that's a reason. There's a lot of competition, so people should look at an alternative."

Casa Loma

Although Massaro has just started taking bookings for Pearson – they have only a few functions scheduled for 2006 right now – the competition to get a choice date at Casa Loma is fierce.

"Right now, we're booking to the end of 2008," says Katz. "We have a quite a few Saturdays available in 2007 and 2008. We do have some alternate dates for 2006. Saturdays tend to go quickly though."

If your specific Sunday is already booked at Casa Loma, don't worry. Katz says there's one important benefit for celebrating on a weekday.

"If a client wants to book on a weekday it's cheaper, so that could be a deciding factor for some people."

Hottest club in the city transforms into Ice Lounge

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Representing nine of some of Toronto's hottest clubs, bars and restaurants, Liberty Group Entertainment offers something for everyone.

If the idea of getting married at a venue fit for a queen appeals to you, the Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex, which was constructed in 1926, is ideal for entertaining groups anywhere from 150 to 3,000 people.

"The Liberty Grand is the number 1 entertainment complex in the city," said marketing manager Milka Mili.

But, she added, C Lounge, a "spa-inspired bar," with Toronto's only "water-feature," a little pool surrounded by private cabanas and couches, was the most popular venue of the summer.

In an attempt to keep C Lounge at the top of bar-hoppers' lists, Liberty Group (416-542-3789 or visit www.libertygroup.com) is in the process of transforming the patio into a winter wonderland.

The C Lounge patio, which will be known as Ice Lounge for the winter, will be adorned with ice fixtures.

"The entire lounge will be set in ice, the chairs and the bar," Mili said.

She added that if this transformation is a success, Liberty Group will make it an annual thing.

"We are constantly changing and evolving. We are always one step ahead of the competition."

But if you're of the school of thought that ice fixtures should be reserved for igloos, not bars, perhaps the Rosewater Supper Club, near the theatre district, is more appealing.

"Rosewater is an award-winning five-star dining restaurant. It has sponsored the Toronto International Film Festival every year for the last nine years," Mili boasted.

"It is a restaurant, but we also do have a bar, a private dining area and a cigar lounge," she added.

The entertainment group is also behind the restaurants Courthouse Market Grille and Chamber Lounge, Left Bank and Two Rosehill, as well as several clubs, including Phoenix Concert Theatre, Velvet Underground and Splash Patio Bar.

Liberty's hottest idea is an ice-cold lounge.

While Liberty Group represents some of the best attractions in the city, Mili said its customer service is what keeps its clients coming back year after year.

"We create relationships with all our clients. We create friendships, rather than business deals, and I think that is why many people come back every year," Mili said.

New and elegant ways to serve an old favourite

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Looking for some simple yet elegant recipes for a luncheon or afternoon tea? Look no further than the classic canned tuna and salmon, says Peter Clarke, director of marketing for Clover Leaf.

"When it comes to tuna and salmon, consumers are looking beyond the old-time favourites."

Health conscious men and women are beginning to see tuna as the perfect food, he said. "It's low in fat, high in protein, easily transportable, and best of all, it's versatile. It can be eaten in all shapes and forms."

In the past year, he said, quoting Clover Leaf statistics, Canadians consumed enough salmon and tuna that if laid end to end, the cans would stretch from Victoria to St. John's and back again.

"If you were to make tuna sandwiches consumed by Canadians last year and stack them on top of each other, you could fill a hole that went down one-third of the way to the centre of the earth."

He offers the following recipes:

THAI TUNA WRAPS

The savoury flavours of ginger, peanut butter and cider vinegar combined with the convenience of packaged coleslaw make a wonderful wrap. Hint: For added crunch, add some chopped peanuts.

¼ cup light mayonnaise
2 tbsp. cider vinegar
1½ tbsp. peanut butter
1 tsp. grated fresh ginger root
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper
1 can flaked white tuna, drained
2 cups purchased broccoli slaw or coleslaw
4 6-in. flour tortillas

Whisk together mayonnaise, vinegar, peanut butter, ginger, salt and pepper until smooth. Stir in tuna and slaw.

Spoon onto tortillas and roll up to enclose filling; cut in half. Makes 4 servings.

Per serving: 229 calories; 12.8 g protein; 10.3 g fat; 22.9 g carbohydrate; 2.4 g dietary fibre.

TINY APPETIZER TUNA PANCAKES

1 can flaked light tuna, drained
½ cup pancake mix
⅓ cup milk
1 egg
2 tsp. vegetable oil
2 tbsp. finely chopped green onion
2 tbsp. finely chopped red pepper
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
½ cup dairy sour cream
¼ cup mayonnaise
2 tsp. Dijon mustard

Combine pancake mix, milk, egg and oil. Whisk until fairly smooth. Stir in tuna, onion, red pepper and parsley.

Heat skillet over medium heat; brush with oil. Drop batter by level tablespoon onto skillet, spreading to 2-in. circles.

When underside is golden, turn over and bake until other side is golden. Keep warm. Repeat until all batter is used.

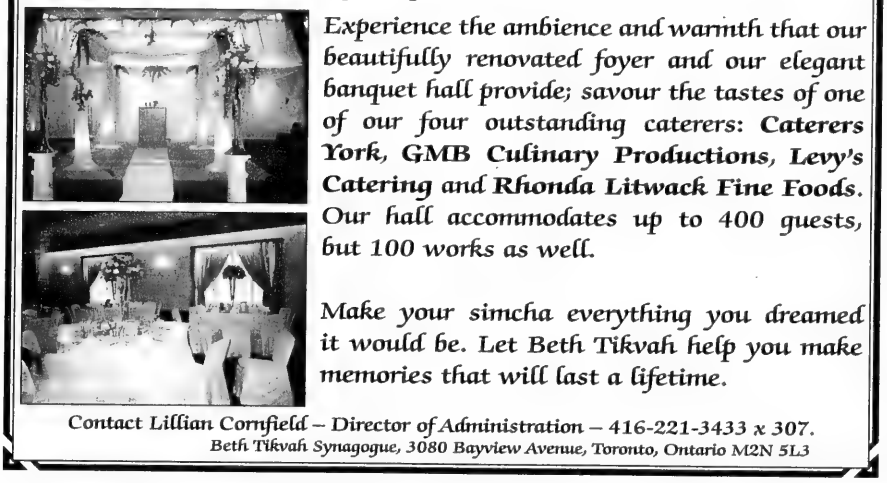
Serve with sauce made by combining sour cream, mayonnaise and mustard. To eat, spoon a little sauce on top of pancake, or dip pancake into sauce. Makes about 24 tiny pancakes.

ORIENTAL TUNA BITES WITH PLUM SAUCE

1 can flaked light tuna drained
1 egg, lightly beaten
1 green onion, chopped
1 clove garlic, minced
½ cup chilled cooked rice
3 tbsp. dry bread crumbs
2 tsp. soya sauce
1 tsp. minced fresh ginger root
plum sauce

Combine tuna, egg, green onion, garlic, rice, bread crumbs, soya sauce and ginger root; mix well. Shape into 1-in. balls.

Place on greased baking sheet. Bake at 400, 12 to 15 minutes or until lightly browned. Serve with plum sauce for dipping. Makes 12 tuna balls.



Reality TV inspires the latest party trend

A birthday girl sports her Survivor head buff.

Reality TV shows get more than good ratings. Now, they're gaining attention in party circles.

Today's enthusiastic parents and hip kids are constantly seeking innovative party themes, and knock-offs of hit TV shows such as Survivor fit the bill.

In addition to pleasing party crowds, these games encourage team spirit and enjoyment. And Dollard des Ormeaux's Corey Szwarcok, 28, and Mitch Zeltzer, 26, have added an enlightening component to the concept: besides adopting ideas from the original CBS reality show, the founders of Dynamix Adventures tailor each party to the birthday celebrant's age and interest group.

> Immunity challenges and tribal councils

Kidivor, a two-hour birthday adventure, is geared to boys and girls ages eight to adult. On the TV show, 18 people are stranded in a jungle or on a faraway island and must fend for food and water, and fans tune in weekly to follow their progress. As part of the competition, teams face-off in an "immunity challenge," with the losing team going to a "tribal council," where they vote to eliminate one of their members.

But party-goers need not fret about food, water, or being sent home empty-handed. Thanks to their hosts and Dynamix Adventurers, celebrants receive refreshments and prizes.

At a recent birthday party, a group of elementary school girls gathered in a circle to learn the rules.

"This game of Kidivor will be all about challenges, but you won't have to eat any terrible food," Zeltzer explained, alluding to the actual reality program.

Subsequently, the birthday party-goers were divided into teams, and each team was asked to come up with a name.

Exciting challenges followed. Children received plungers, which served as torches. The youngster at the end of the line had to place a rubber ball on the top of her torch, zig zag to the other end of the group and transfer the ball to a teammate, who would follow suit. The first team to complete the circuit won.

> 'You don't have to eat any terrible food'

They used hula hoops with Velcro for another challenge that involved building a cube. Once complete, the cubes were placed on a small holder.

Another challenge was an intellectual one. Dropping round circles strategically, the party celebrants created a replica of a maze. The task was to discover which team could get a member through it. This is where memory and instant recall came into play.

As a finale, Aviva, the birthday girl, had an opportunity to earn a personal reward challenge. The third grader was shown four prizes and asked to place them in order of preference. Then she performed a mind-boggling feat.

Within a time limit of two minutes, this local Jewish day school student had to complete a memory game, guess some numbers and pile cups in order to claim the prizes.

She managed the task in one minute and 12 seconds. Bravo, Aviva!

Bridal gowns just as special as you

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Your childhood dream has come true – you are getting married and you get to plan the wedding to the very last ribbon. But now, how to choose the dress?

Of all the beautiful dresses out there, the cream of the crop can be found at two Toronto stores. Madeline's and Tricia Cochran Bridal Studio offer dresses for brides, bridesmaids and anyone else who wants to come to the party.

Madeline's (416-789-4890) specializes in couture and ready-to-wear bridal wear. The bridal dresses are all designed by Madeline Zito herself.

When Zito started designing years ago, she knew it was something she loved. "It's so great to get to do what you love," she says.

Jayn Simpson bridalwear.

After graduating from the International Academy of Design, Zito went on to specialize in bridal gowns. Together with her husband, Zito opened the boutique and has been loving it ever since.

Madeline's offers dresses in every style imaginable. "I try to have a bit for everyone," says Zito.

Following current trends, most of her dresses are strapless but can be changed to suit you. "It's those intricate details that make dresses so special," she says. From adding sleeves to cutting length, "we can do anything."

As well as wedding dresses, Madeline's offers fabulous evening gowns imported from New York, Los Angeles and Europe. The dresses are made of the finest silks and laces and can be custom-made to your every need.

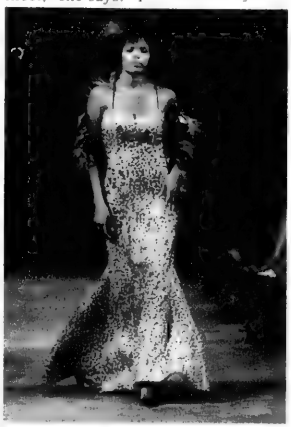
"You could have the most perfect body, and the dress might still not fit right," Zito says.

With her bubbly voice and sweet demeanor, Zito disarms you at every moment. During the span of our conversation, I wished that I was getting married too!

All the beading on Zito's dresses is done with Swarovski crystals and fabrics are the best quality possible. "My approach is very young and fresher than most," she says. "I dress for the modern bride and I love it."

Another fantastic option for bridal wear is Tricia Cochran Bridal Studio (416-964-9220). For the past 25 years, the store has been the home of ready-to-wear as well as couture wedding gowns.

More recently, the store launched the business-wear line of Jayn Simpson, the new owner of the studio. An accomplished designer in her own right, Simpson just put on her first runway show during Toronto Fashion Week last May.



Jayn Simpson-designed dress. Simpson is the owner of Tricia Cochran Bridal Studio.

Simpson's designers were sold at high-end retailers in Ottawa and Vancouver until she moved to Toronto and took over the studio. To her, it seemed like a natural step – to combine her natural talent and love for design with the already wonderful studio seemed like a perfect fit.

The dresses at Trisha Cochran Bridal Studio are made of the finest silks from France and Italy. The studio offers custom design and features samples. "We work until it's absolutely perfect," says Simpson. The studio offers a wide variety of bridesmaid dresses as well.

Simpson's dresses are classically clean cut, to make you look as beautiful as possible. "We are very personal and get to know the clients lifestyle," says Simpson. "I really love to get to know the clients and see their confidence grow in these dresses."

Simpson cites a rebirth of lace as a current beautiful trend. This old-fashioned-with-a-twist look is just one of the marvellous looks the studio can pull off of the studio. "We really like to flatter your body in every way possible," she says.

Finding the perfect dress is like finding the perfect mate – you'll know when you are in love. To find just the right dress for your special day, visit a studio that will incorporate your every wish into the dress of your dreams…Madeline's and Tricia Cochran Bridal Studio can do just that.

Intangible & tangible gifts

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Tickets to the musical Lord of the Rings make great gifts. John Karastamatis, director of communications for Mirvish Productions (416-872-1212, www.mirvish.com), says people are tired of the usual gifts, so they're buying theatre tickets to give to their loved ones instead.

"In the last decade, we have found that each year more people buy theatre tickets as gifts. Perhaps people are consumered out with the regular consumer items. How many toasters can people own? Now people look to give an experience."

An experience from Mirvish Productions, which brought productions of Mama Mia! and The Lion King to Toronto, doesn't have to gouge your wallet. Tickets go for under $30.

"There are always seats for as low as $25 in the theatre. There's always an accessibility level," Karastamatis says.

Of course, you don't have to buy the cheapest seat, or any seat for that matter. Purchasing gift certificates is popular among Mirvish gift givers.

"You can buy tickets to specific performances, but you can also buy gift certificates that people can exchange to buy tickets," says Karastamatis. "Anything you want to give, it's up to you. You could estimate what the price of a ticket will be, give them one or two tickets in gift certificates or buy a round figure, like $10 or $20."

For some people, buying a theatre ticket or gift certificate for someone isn't enough. Karastamatis says a few Mirvish clients want the whole theatre experience, literally.

"Besides your regular gifts, we also have places to throw parties. For birthdays, we certainly have reception rooms in our theatre, and we can organize something at intermission, like a backstage tour. These are all custom-designed, and we get all kinds of requests. People want to meet someone in the cast, and we've had people who want to propose on stage. That's happened quite a bit. They sometimes ask the performers to ask for marriage."

Not everything's possible – some casts aren't as open to meeting their fans as others – but Karastamatis encourages people to share their desires and Mirvish will try their best to fulfil them.

"People should ask the questions if they want anything specific. We pride ourselves on being as flexible as possible. One couple wanted their picture taken in their favourite seats. They said, 'We were on our honeymoon back in 1946 and we sat in this seat in the Royal Alex Theatre, and we want to come back now.'"

Gift givers won't have a problem picking out a show to buy tickets for. Lord of the Rings – probably 2006's most anticipated show – opens Feb. 6 and tickets are already going fast.

"Lord of the Rings will be a popular choice as a holiday gift," says Karastamatis. "We've sold over 100,000 tickets. Once we get into the gift-buying season – the middle to end of November is when people start buying gifts – we anticipate more demand for the tickets.

"And once people see it, we believe it will be even more popular. It's really quite amazing how fast word spreads. If a show is good, people are more confident in buying tickets, and if the show is not good, it's amazing how quickly word spreads on that. The key is putting on a wonderful show."

Karastamatis says Lord of the Rings tickets are a perfect gift for kids, a demographic that Mirvish wants to attract.

"We believe in building a future audience. As everyone knows, the audience tends to be a bit older. I think that's not just for financial reasons. Theatre is appreciated by older people because they're at a stage in their lives where they can sit for two or three hours. When you're younger, it's hard to sit for that long and not participate in any way. We do encourage young people to go to the theatre. We always try to give a student price [$25] when we can."

Batia Kenet and samples of her plaster dolls.

Besides Lord of The Rings, Mirvish is putting on The Boyfriend, a 1950s musical that originally starred Julie Andrews, who now directs the musical. After The Boyfriend's six-week run, The Innocent Eye, an original Canadian production, plays at the Royal Alex.

For people who like their gifts more tangible and Judaic, artist Batia Kenet (905-764-7643) has the perfect present. Kenet, who runs Figure Tales, creates plaster dolls not the Barbie type though. Most of these figurines are biblical, including Moses holding the Ten Commandments or Adam and Eve with the forbidden fruit. She also makes dolls that reflect a gift recipient's personality.

"I make biblical stories, the traditional ones [such as bar mitzvah and wedding figurines], and then the character ones. Someone told me she wanted to buy something for her parents, but she didn't know what. The mother likes to knit and the father likes music, so I made something that reflected their hobbies."

Kenet, who was born in Russia, lived in Israel and now calls Toronto home, started Figure Tales seven years ago, but she's still developing her business. There's no storefront – if you want a doll you have to call her and set up an appointment.

"I don't do a lot of advertising – these are special order dolls," she says.

Besides designing figurines, Kenet creates custom plates and photo albums. But a great gift idea, she says, is buying someone a space in one of her workshops, where they can learn to make these things on their own.

"I give people everything they need. When they are doing the workshop, they can create more than one thing, like a doll and two plates, or two plates with something else. I supply everything so people can do whatever they want."

She says the fact that she doesn't have a store shouldn't deter people from browsing. "I'm doing this from home – the best way to take a look is to come over."

Other gift companies advertising in this supplement are: Eileen's Pearls, 416-630-1463; Lilliane's Fine Jewellery, 416-920-7676; Nutcracker Sweet Incorporated, 416-782-3232; jessyjudaica, 416-398-4432.

Sweet 16 celebrations still sweet

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Echoes of the refrain from Neil Sedaka's Happy Birthday Sweet 16 dance vividly in my mind with the familiar melody still being played at midnight at the sweet 16 parties of today.

Turning sweet 16 is often a pivotal moment in a teenage girl's life. While many girls have celebrated their coming of age at 12 or 13 through a bat mitzvah program of study, often paired with a party, 16 represents yet another milestone.

Almost ready to graduate high school, today's sweet 16 is poised, self-confident and ready to move forward. But the time around a young woman's 16th birthday can also be filled with awkwardness and peer pressure, as she searches to find the right place in which to feel comfortable, where she can fit in.

A celebration of this coming-of-age, whether shared with close family and friends or in a party on a more elaborate scale, is still important to many a sweet 16.

MTV has even gotten into the act with its new television series, My Super Sweet 16, featuring teens preparing to celebrate those special birthdays with a party to end all parties.

Often highlighting the daughter of a celebrity, the show chronicles the planning of the party, the purchase of the dress, and the gift of her dreams provided by her parents. One recent show portrayed the party planner thinking about extravagant theme ideas, hiring a personal shopper to find the right dress and Daddy purchasing the Mercedes sports car as the primary gift for his daughter. The car, replete with a large bow tied over the hood, was driven onto the dance floor at the party.

Another episode saw the party room transformed into a romantic Parisian backdrop in a Moulin Rouge setting with Can-Can dancers ushering in the sweet 16 debutante and her family.

Josée Eliasoph and her daughter Dalia are much more realistic in their party planning. Dalia will turn sweet 16 in January and they are working within a strict budget. The two have been planning a joint celebration with three other childhood friends.

"This group of girls have been close friends since Grade 1," Josée says. "They have so many friends in common that it came naturally to plan something together."

A local hotel is the venue where approximately 100 friends will party together at their joint sweet 16 celebration. Food will be limited to kid-friendly finger food such as pizza and chicken fingers. The emphasis has been placed on hiring a top-notch disc jockey to keep the crowd dancing and having fun.

"Essentially, the party is a big dance," Josée explains. "It's all about the kids."

Another twist on the party theme came as a surprise to one very happy 16-year-old. Michelle Stock thought a few of her closest friends were coming over for cake to mark her 16th birthday. Her mother urged her to answer the doorbell one more time. To her great surprise, a white stretch limousine was waiting outside. She and her friends were whisked downtown to a trendy restaurant for a celebratory dinner.

Since the party was planned by her friends and sanctioned by her parents, Michelle had no idea and truly enjoyed her evening. Dinner, dessert and lots of time to exchange stories and capture the celebration in photos made the evening truly a sweet sweet 16.

Michelle Stock and a small group of close friends glam it up for the camera before heading downtown for her surprise sweet 16 limo and dinner evening. [Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photo]

Photography that 'captures life'

By JENNIFER THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

A good photographer can capture special moments and memories on film. Beautiful portraits of people and events create cherished keepsakes that last for generations. Located in Toronto, Paula Feig has become well known for her "social photography."

Paula F. Photography, which offers "photography capturing life," specializes in creating beautiful family and children's photos. It has built an excellent reputation for creating classic and professionally shot portraits. Feig also photographs many charity events and bar and bat mitzvahs. She has established herself in the Jewish community and has an excellent rapport with her clients.

Formerly David Mirvish's assistant, Feig created Paula F. Photography (416-636-9466) more than a year ago. A new mother herself, she says she understands and especially enjoys photographing children. Her love for photography combined with her love for children made for a natural match. She says that a good age to begin having portraits of your child done is approximately six months.

Paula F. Photography can create a number of different portraits for your child's life events. One unique package showcases your child by celebrating his or her first major life stages. Beginning at six months of age, Feig will do portraits every six months until the child is 1½ years old. Parents will then have a beautiful package of memories to last forever.

Feig also loves to shoot on location. She has photographed many children's birthday parties and other events. She will come to your house and capture the candid moments of your children's most precious days. She also photographs baby namings and brit milah (bris) services.

Like all photographers, Feig encourages you to book as far ahead as possible when planning events. Should you wish to book for a bar or bat mitzvah, a year ahead is a good rule of thumb. Many dates, especially through the busy spring and summer seasons, book quickly. However, Feig also stressed her flexibility. She will do her best to accommodate any event.

When choosing a photographer, it is important to be confident and comfortable with your choice. A visit to Paula Feig's website showcases her talents and her ability to capture life's significant moments on film. (www.paulafphotography.com) She focuses on natural and casual poses that make for beautiful life portraits.

As for package options, Paula welcomes you to meet with her for a free consultation. Package options are all based on the individual client's needs and wants.

Feig's experience working with children make her the perfect choice when you want to capture your family's lives on film. Life-cycle events turn into beautiful memories with Paula F. Photography.

Lingerie and undergarments to make you feel and look good

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Any good wardrobe consultant will advise you that the most expensive and elegant outfit cannot look its best without the proper foundation garments. These are most important for a smooth and finished look, no matter what style you have chosen, and the perfect undergarments are not always easy to find.

Tryst Lingerie (416-484-6678) owner Shana Tilbrook is well-acquainted with this dilemma. When she found it difficult to find properly fitting bras, she realized there was an untapped market of women seeking more guidance and variety in their undergarment purchases. Together with her mother, Louise Sommers, she opened up shop.

"Eighty per cent of women wear the wrong size," Tilbrook says. "We do fittings here to make sure that everyone is fitted properly."

With more than 100 sizes, ranging from Size 30 to 48 and AA to J, Tryst can help virtually all women.

"We know our stock and how our sizes work. I know right off the bat what's going to work for a woman once I know what her size is," Tilbrook says. "People think that bra fitting just comes down to size, but it also has to do with shape."

The store specializes not only in size but also in variety. Carrying a vast array of bra styles, it has inventory suited to many different styles of tops. Whether a neckline is plunging or sporty, strapless or fitted, the look will be complemented by the appropriately selected and fitted bra. Beaded bra straps, lacy camisoles and corsets can also add festive sparkle to an outfit. One exquisite gold silk corset can be worn alone or with a jacket.

Judy Mann of Underwraps says the focus of the store is hostess gowns and lingerie.

The list of manufacturers Tryst carries is impressive – Fantasie, Freya, Lejaby, Princess Tam Tam, Chantelle, Change, Passionata, Canadian-made Arianne and even the Oprah Bar, are all represented in-store. Designs by Betsy Johnston are available and Oscar de la Renta accessories will be coming in for the spring. Hanky Panky, its number 1 selling underwear, is very comfortable and available in a huge assortment of colours.

Lingerie parties are a customer favourite. Women can come to the store after hours with friends to eat, drink and shop, with the store to themselves. They can peruse the large selection of undergarments, pyjamas and lingerie and enjoy the shopping experience, along with a 10 per cent discount.

To help you take your time and enjoy your shopping experience, Tryst has a children's play area and a men's reading area with comfortable seats.

Underwraps (416-782-5779) is a lingerie store for those who enjoy a more leisurely lifestyle. Owner Judy Mann explains that "the focus of the store is the hostess gowns and lingerie."

Designed for elegance with comfort, the hostess gowns are meant to be worn alone. A busy hostess need only don a pair of pantyhose and slip on a pair of shoes, and she is on her way to a carefree, yet stylish evening. The floor-length gowns come in a variety of colours and materials, including chiffon, velour, velvet and soft cotton.

Mann shops for her stock in New York and attends the lingerie shows there to ensure her store carries not only the most recent fashions, but also those not regularly available in Toronto.

"I try to have a broad selection of all kinds of sleepwear," she says.

The variations in style are surprising. Some hostess gowns have full-length ribbons attached over one solid piece, for a different, whimsical effect. Another fun gown has a hood and kangaroo pockets. Others are accented with delicate lace or ribbon, youthful plaid and even brooches, for an all-inclusive look.

Technology saves time for wedding planners

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

A personal website can serve as a virtual wedding planner. Everything from responding to invitations and bridal registry information to hotel arrangements and maps for out-of-towners can be posted on the web.

The trick is to have the site set up as soon as your engagement is announced. You can even arrange to have your own domain and save your wedding memories on DVD.

Instead of rummaging through little bits of paper and note pads that tend to get mislaid, the bride and groom can document everything. By backing everything up on a CD, they can keep all the information intact.

In addition to professional webmasters, there are numerous savvy students who can set up a site. And many learning centres offer excellent courses on building a website, preparing graphics and doing layout. Since most weddings are planned several months to a year ahead, the couple will get their money's worth from the site. Moreover, the documentation lasts a lifetime.

Couples can post invitations to prenuptial events and the wedding and ask guests to respond. The florist, photographer, caterer and honeymoon particulars can all be linked. Include links under certain topics, so that family, guests and service people can make contact. Links to your bridal registry can save lots of hassles for everyone. To ensure privacy for certain aspects of the site, include a password.

Out-of-town guests will find useful information when they visit the wedding website. For starters, post maps and directions to wedding venues, as well as places of interest for adults and their children to visit while they are in town.

After the wedding, everyone is eager to recapture the ambience of the ceremony and reception. With a website, it's so easy to post photos, toasts and speeches from this auspicious occasion.

With today's digital equipment, the web is also a perfect medium for the newlyweds to display photographs of their honeymoon. The modern technology offers several advantages: saving on postal hassles, enjoying numerous slides shows and photographs, being able to edit the site as plans change, checking RSVPs, arranging hotel rooms, sharing your wedding plans and thanking family and friends for their gifts and participation.

Another way to help keep all your information in order is through the use of electronic organizers. A wedding planner can load her handheld PDA (Personal Digital Assistant) with contact information on florists, synagogues, hotels, dressmakers, caterers, printers and photographers. Instead of lugging around notebooks crammed with clippings and references, she can use her PDA to keep all the data organized and instantly available.

And among the modern cellphones are some that combine a handheld computer with a digital wireless phone in a single, easy-to-hold unit. These devices enable users to access the web, send and receive e-mail messages, browse the Internet, have built-in phone books, and hold contact lists, calendars, to-do lists and memo features. In addition, with the smart phone keyboards, the user is assured a seamless secure link to corporate e-mail systems.

Making you feel and look good

Cotton is available in many different forms, from diamond quilted to brushed or finished with satin.

At Underwraps, gift-givers can choose from a selection of pyjamas, slippers, perfume bottles, bracelets and earrings, skirt and top sets, and shells. The store offers choices for many of a woman's life cycle events, with bridal sleepwear sets, nursing nightgowns and matching mother-and-baby outfits by Breast is Best. Other merchandise includes slips, panties, scarves and cosmetic bags.

From the elegance of silk peignoir sets to the warmth of fleecy, long nightgowns, loungers and morning robes, there is much to choose from. Some of the designer names represented in the store are Natori, Hanro, Diamond T, Louis Feraud, Donna Karan and Calvin Klein.Gift certificates are available. With such an array of stylish women's wear and accessories available in a warm and convenient shop, this year's Chanukah gift shopping should be done at Underwraps.

Wedding gown construction 101

More goes into the construction of a wedding gown than most of us realize. Few brides today have the time or professional skills to fashion their own wedding gown or dressy attire, but every woman can learn to recognize the styling components involved in creating high quality garments.

In addition to gaining an appreciation of haute couture, a knowledgeable consumer will be able to gauge whether a garment is worth the asking price. For example, high quality imported fabric and exclusive designer labels tend to cost more. Details and finishing touches will also affect the price.

Once the bride-to-be masters the basic components involved in the construction of a gown, she is ready to go out and shop for the dress of her dreams. Nevertheless, what looks good on the mannequins or the models in a fashion magazine isn't necessarily going to work on every figure. The bride must judge what suits her best.

The silhouette refers to the cut of a gown. It is the most important component to consider because the shape of the gown should flatter the bride's figure. While some women prefer a fitted bodice and a full, bell-shaped skirt in a gown, others opt for a more form-fitting style, such as A-line or sheath.

The bodice is the upper portion of the gown structured around the individual's ribcage. It covers the chest and back and includes the neckline and waistline. It is essential to have this part of the gown fit properly.

The neckline is something most consumers immediately take notice of when seeking a garment. The neckline should flatter the bride's overall appearance, since it draws attention to her face, shoulders and neck. With some necklines, the jewel, bateau and high collar sit high on the neck or cover the collarbone. Others, such as the portrait, sweetheart, scoop and keyhole expose more of the body.

Waistlines differ, and unlike during the Victorian era, brides are no longer expected to squeeze into their gowns to show off minuscule waists. The elongated V-shape of a Basque waist beautifully sets off a full ball gown. The natural waist on an A-line dress subtly highlights the gentle curve of the body. The dropped waists of the 1920s create the illusion of a longer torso. On the other hand, Empire-style waists are often chosen for their slimming effect.

Sleeves can be designed in numerous ways. Long-sleeved styles are especially attractive when set off with a puff at the shoulder.

The skirt can be full, flared, layered and decorative or slim and simple. The length of the gown runs the gamut from floor, ankle or tea length to above or at the knees.

Traditionally, the train adds allure to the wedding procession. The train is the elongated back portion of the outfit that lies on the floor and trails behind the bride. Trains date from the Middle Ages, when the length of a train worn at court indicated a person's social rank. The rich could afford more fabric, so their ensembles included long trains.

Texture, drape and season are all considerations for a bride when choosing the fabric for her gown. Silk is a natural fibre often used for wedding dresses. Silk is prized for its lustre, resiliency, elasticity and strength. Duchesse satin is a blend of silk and rayon that is lighter in weight and not as expensive a pure silk. Woven silks – chiffons, tulle and organza – are often used for skirts with multiple layers because they are transparent and lightweight. Today, there are so many splendid fabrics on the market that the bride is never at a loss for something that feels as good as it looks.

In addition, there are many varieties of lace, which has maintained its appeal since the 15th century. Lace-making incorporates the looping, braiding and interlacing of cotton, silk, nylon and other types of thread to complete a pattern. Just as sequins and pearls are used to enhance the gown, lace is often used for detail. Whether it's Alençon, Guipure, Spanish, Venetian Point or Chantilly, lace adds understated elegance to the ensemble.

Brides may choose varied hues and although white predominates in the western world, shades range from snow white to ivory.

Bridal veils and headpieces are functional and esthetic components that a well-groomed bride takes special pride in choosing.

Wedding gowns have changed through the years

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Selecting the perfect bridal dress is the dream of many a young woman as she contemplates her special day, the day she promises to love and cherish her chosen man. It is her day to shine and feel like royalty.

Purchasing the wedding gown has become an all-consuming endeavour for many of today's brides, but in past centuries, most wore any outfit that was different from their daily wear. The dress worn by a bride during the marriage ceremony was supposed to become her best dress, to be worn after the wedding for special occasions.

Myrna Kravitz Krackovitch

Although white became the traditional and preferred colour for western culture after England's Queen Victoria dressed in white satin for her wedding in 1840, over the years, styles have evolved and today's brides look for up-to-the-minute fashion.

During the depression of the 1930s, the wedding dress started to be known as a wedding gown to show luxury for the occasion, and hemlines were lowered to floor length. As the world went to war, the next decade saw more tailored gowns and less attention was paid to elaborate trimmings. Designs were tailored with padded shoulders and belted waistlines.

The more affluent 1950s brought back some extravagant styles with lace and off-the-shoulder necklines. Then along came the '60s, and many brides favoured a more contemporary style reflecting the "flower power" emergence of the hippie era.

By the '70s there was a revival of nostalgia and many baby-boomers thought of updating and wearing their mothers' wedding gowns to create a sense of continuity and history. The '80s saw more elaborate styles being produced with the use of beading and lace, especially on the dress bodice; and the '90s, with the turn of the century ahead, brought a sense of individuality as bridal wear ran the gamut from restoring styles of the past to creating new and unique fashions such as the mermaid dress – a form-fitting to-the-knees style with a flared floor-length skirt.

These style changes are reflected in the choice of gowns of some of our local brides. When the late Faye Jacobson married Peter Freed in 1939, she chose a simple, tailored, floor-length chiffon gown with an empire waist, short bell sleeves and high ruffled neckline. Twenty-eight years later, their daughter Keena also opted for a simple gown. She wore a slim satin style with long sleeves and a detachable embroidered satin train when she married Alan Levy in the winter of 1967.

However, when it was the Levy daughter Heidi's turn at the altar to marry Emmanuel Maman in 1994, her wedding gown was very different from the ones worn by her grandmother and her mother. Heidi selected a much more elaborate, princess-like design: a full-skirted lace ensemble with long lace sleeves and a matching train.

In 1998, when Stephanie Krackovitch married my son Jarrad, she also chose a wedding gown that was very different from the one her mother, Myrna Kravitz, had worn more than a quarter of a century earlier at her March 1972 wedding to Brian Krackovitch.

Myrna's slim, floor-length white satin gown and matching small train had a high neck and long sleeves, while Stephanie chose a very full-skirted chiffon fashion with a satin bodice and small cap sleeves for her June wedding.

Today's bride has any number of designs from which to choose, or she can work with a couturier to create her own unique wedding outfit. So, as soon as the marriage proposal is made and accepted, start shopping for that perfect dress, the one that will help you create the wedding of your dreams, to make you feel special and be a princess for a day.

Beautiful gift baskets can be tailored to any budget

By Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Breaking open a beautifully wrapped gift basket chock full of a variety of goodies can thrill recipients of any age.

No one knows that better than Nili Dzaldov of Baskets n'Stuf (416-250-9116) and Elaine Akler of Nutcracker Sweet (416-782-3232).

Even those ordering the baskets have a good time, says Dzaldov, who has had her store, located at the southeast corner of Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue for 15 years.

"It's a happy business. People come in and enjoy choosing items. The only complaint I get is that I have too much variety. It's difficult to choose from so many items."

Baskets, she says, are a great way to express your thoughts. "We can help welcome a new baby, wish someone a happy birthday, celebrate a special anniversary, or send get well wishes, or say bon voyage."

She also creates baskets for corporate clients who may want gifts for their clients or employees, as well as centrepieces for bar/bat mitzvahs or weddings.

Nili Dzaldov of Baskets n'Stuf, left and a sample of products from Nutracker Sweet.

After asking a few questions about the occasion, Dzaldov says, "we can create a custom-made basket filled with products including kosher gourmet items, fresh fruits, baby gifts, plush toys, bath products or your choice of many innovative and quality giftwear items."

Baby baskets, which do not often include food unless customers want to include a treat for the new mom, can consist of outfits, sleepers, rocking chairs, rattle toys, or plush animals. "The basket can be created to be the entire baby present, or it can be a small, added extra along with the gift."

Price is not an issue, she says, because she can create baskets to fit any budget.

Dzaldov says she takes as much pride in decorating the baskets as she does in filling them. "Seeing the brightly decorated gift items sitting in a unique basket is a treat in itself. Some people wait a few days before opening it because it looks so elegant."

Akler, who has been in business for 20 years, says because baskets are so personal, "people are amazed when they receive them. They're loaded with all their favourite treats, keeping in mind any dietary restrictions."

Seeing how beautifully they're decorated, she says, "is an added bonus. We can create gifts from a wicker basket, an elegant glass tray or bowl, or a ceramic piece – any number of things."

Customers can visit her stores at 1936 Avenue Rd. or downtown at Scotia Plaza. They can also shop by phone, or order a basket online (www.nutcrackersweet.com), and baskets can be delivered anywhere in Canada or United States.

Staff is always available to help choose the right gift. "We ask a few questions about the recipient's likes and dislikes, and we decide on a budget. After that, we create an amazing present."

Reunions a way of maintaining family ties

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

We raise our children and help them to develop into adults with the strength and ability to go forward into the world and fend for themselves.

We also must give them the stability that comes from knowing from where they came; knowing their background and their heritage. When we are fortunate enough to have surviving family members, we should get to know them and introduce them to our children.

However, as each arm of a family continues to grow, and the cost of holding affairs becomes more expensive, it is understandable that hosts are scaling down the number of invited guests, and unfortunately extended family members are not making the list. Over the years, my family get-togethers have become limited to events held by and for my siblings and myself and our children and grandchildren. Sadly, cousins are seen only at funerals as our elders begin to pass away.

There is a simple solution: organize a family reunion. There are many websites devoted to offering suggestions for planning just such family get-togethers. One site noted, "The most important things parents can give their children are Roots & Wings."

Several years ago, when a cousin and I discussed re-establishing our "cousins' parties," little did we realize how much they would grow. Although the first potluck brunch was solely for first cousins living in our city and our parents (those who were still around) and numbered about 20, we have progressed to inviting second and third cousins that made this year's reunion a four-generation outing.

There was excitement in the air as we prepared for yet another trek along the 401 last June – this time to attend the annual reunion of my maternal family. Relatives were travelling from Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton, and even flying in from California to get to a place called Big Bay, near Barrie, Ont., where the day-long event would take place.

With great anticipation, 75 descendants of Russian immigrants Malka and Isaac Levine congregated on the magnificent grounds of the country home of Anita and Ned Goodman, who hosted the event. We started with a barbecue lunch. The reunion featured swimming, entertainment by a magician and afternoon snacks from an ice-cream cart. After a light supper, reluctant goodbyes were made.

Family members from as young as 12 months to more than 80 years of age shared a wonderful day in fabulous surroundings, meeting one another, making new acquaintances, renewing relationships and reminiscing about the past.

"It's important to maintain family ties," said one of the older family members. "People move apart and with all the little ones – they're the ones who will continue – it's important to show them the meaning of family."

One cousin admitted it made her "feel connected," and Thomas Starr, a third-generation cousin who had taken on the arduous task of preparing the family tree, willingly accepted updates. He used Family Search Personal Ancestral File (a program that is tied in with the Church of Latter Day Saints) and is a free download on the Internet (http://www.familysearch.org).

An added touch were reunion T-shirts lovingly made by Tiffaney Goodman, one of the daughters-in-law of our hosts. These prized, special shirts added a unifying touch of family as everyone – young and old – donned them.

Wedding countdown – plan ahead and avoid stress

Engaged couples and their families can eliminate stress by emulating business managers. Project management works wonders when planning an event. Circle the big day on the calendar and count backward, leaving a week for "Murphy."

"Murphy" refers to Murphy's Law, which says "anything that can go wrong, goes wrong" or something unexpected invariably erupts to corrupt plans.

Whether you use a notebook, index cards or a folder labelled "Wedding" under my "My Documents" on your computer is irrelevant. The object of the exercise is keeping track of each stage of planning.

Emulate business executives by drawing up a progress report when you reach the halfway mark. Report plans that have been carried out thus far, plans that are being implemented now and what still has to be done. Also, note if any snags have occurred and check with the caterer and other parties involved in the wedding.

Once tasks have been carried out, check them off and move on to the ones ahead. Here is a sampling of things that wedding celebrants must attend to at this exciting time in their lives.

Six to 12 months ahead:
- decide budget
- decide type of wedding
- pick date
- create guest list
- book location for ceremony and festivities
- make arrangements with rabbi
- plan honeymoon
- buy dress
- book caterer
- arrange for photographer/videographer
- book band and arrange music for ceremony

Four to six months ahead:
- order invitations
- buy wedding rings
- reserve accommodations for out-of-towners
- choose bridal-party attendants
- arrange bridal gift registry
- get passports for honeymoon
- test out hairdressers and makeup artists
- make a progress report and review plans
- arrange rentals

Eight to four weeks ahead:
- buy headpiece, shoes and personal accessories
- arrange for wedding-day transportation
- send out invitations
- arrange prenuptial
- arrange parties for out-of-towners
- select men's formal wear and rentals
- call vendors to confirm plans

Two weeks before the wedding:
- pick up wedding gown
- confirm scheduled appointments with hairstylist, manicurist, makeup artist
- discuss last-minute details with caterer
- make seating plan
- check RSVP list
- record gifts as you receive them

One week before the wedding:
- give caterer a final head count
- finalize table cards and seating plan
- pick up formal wear and accessories
- schedule a rehearsal and check on speeches and toasts

The last couple of days before the wedding:
- pack for honeymoon
- pack wedding-day bag

The wedding day:
- attend to hair and makeup
- turn up early for photo session
- make sure to eat something nourishing and drink water
- take a deep breath, smile and enjoy – it's your day

Informing all family members can be a challenge

Such a wonderful get-together allows cousins to bond with family members of all generations.

"We can't wait for next year's reunion," was the parting comment made by many.

Organizers need to keep in mind some important tips for planning successful family gatherings: first and foremost, decide where and when the event will be held. Many family members live in different cities, so making arrangements at a resort hotel that is midway between communities can be an option; and long weekends let people plan mini-holidays around the reunion.

An important factor for the co-ordinator is to think about whether you want assistance in planning the event, including the cost of refreshments, or are you prepared to go it alone. Perhaps involving each branch of the family or asking the different generations to participate may be a good idea and more cost-effective.

Informing all family members about the event can be a challenge. It can be done by word of mouth from one family member to another; however, with most people having computers, the message can be passed along via e-mail. Delegate one person to keep lists of e-mail addresses and phone numbers for future reunions.

Besides refreshments, always important at a family gathering, activities should be organized and can be as simple as encouraging relatives to bring memorabilia and photographs or as complex as arranging full-scale genealogy projects, games or entertainment.

Isn't it time your family got together? There are websites to visit to help you get started planning a family reunion. They include www.family-reunion.com and www.genealogy.about.com.

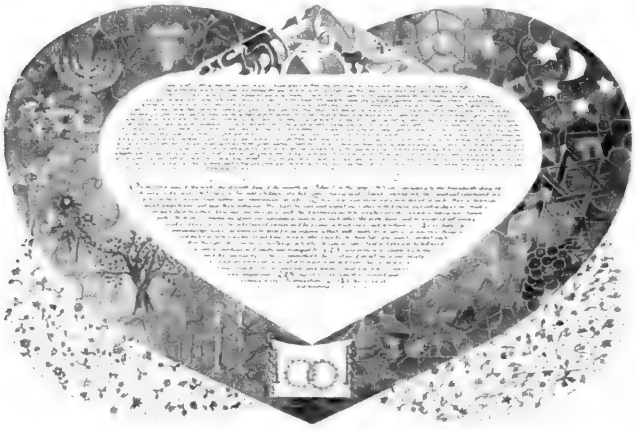
Ketubah artist encouraged by chazzan at her synagogue

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The creation of original ketubah art has enabled artist Diane Sidenberg to marry her passion for water colour and her deep love of Judaica.

Sidenberg, a physiotherapist who has been painting all her life, began creating ketubot after taking a water-colour course seven years ago.

Originally these works were wedding gifts for family and friends, but she recently launched her new company, Ketubbah Art (416-567-5754 and www.ketubbahart.com) after much encouragement from friends and "the chazzan sheini at my shul [Adath Israel Congregation], she says. "When he saw my work, he said, 'Diane, you have to do this.'"



Diane Sidenberg incorporated a Magen David made from two hearts, the scales of justice and medical symbols in a ketubah for a doctor and a lawyer.

She says the hand-painted ketubah is such a welcome contrast to the ketubah she received on her wedding day. "I got a little booklet. It was so ugly. It was machine printed and the rabbi filled in the blanks."

She became interested in the ketubah art form after seeing some hand-painted works.

"I had been in some people's homes and had seen this magnificent art on the wall and I thought to myself, 'If I love painting, and I'm a lover of Judaica, why don't I take something I enjoy and apply it to a mitzvah."

Indeed, Sidenberg had already been involved in Judaica art with her needlepoint work. "I always had a strong passion for Judaica and I love crafts. I made the chupah for Beth David [B'nai Israel Beth Am] synagogue. My sister was the first one to use it."

'Every ketubah is a labour of love'

Sidenberg says she works closely with the betrothed couple to create the actual art work, combining Jewish symbols with those from their lives to create something totally customized and original. "Every ketubah is a labour of love."

For example, she worked with a couple – a doctor and a lawyer– and ended up incorporating a Magen David made from two hearts, the scales of justice and medical symbols into the design.

"I've done a few commissioned works. The clients were all thrilled," says Sidenberg, noting that one couple took a picture of their ketubah and had it printed up as thank-you notes.

Because the ketubah is a legal document, Sidenberg, a trained calligrapher as well, still prefers to have a scribe do all the Hebrew calligraphy. "For Conservative and Orthodox weddings, the text has to be provided and proofread by the rabbi. I can do the English if people choose to have English.

"They can pick symbols, colours, style and English text."

Sidenberg says so much work goes into planning the wedding, but many people overlook the ketubah because they don't realize they can have a customized document. "This is something they can include in their planning like everything else."

And it's perfect for baby boomers marrying off their children, she adds. "Baby boomers are fussier. They want to have more unique items for their children's weddings."

Sidenberg does other Judaica commissions for occasions, including an anniversary ketubah. "I can do a ketubah that commemorates the event. It's not a legal document, but a keepsake."

Other items include blessings for the home and certificates for baby namings or brit milahs or bar or bat mitzvahs.

Doing this kind of art work is very gratifying, particularly the ketubot, Sidenberg says. "The fun part is working with the couple to create something that they'll enjoy looking at on their wall. And they'll be remembering their wedding, that special day. What can be nicer than that?"

Another Ketubah artist advertising in this supplement is: Ketubah Ketubah, 416-963-9191.

You can be creative in preparing wraps

Mix and match ingredients

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Wraps are easy to prepare, can be as simple or as elaborate as you wish, can be meat, dairy or pareve, and can be served hot or cold.

So, what's the best way to wrap a wrap to keep all of those fresh ingredients from spilling out? It depends on the wrap you choose.

Tortillas can be spread with ingredients, rolled up and served hot or cold. The best way to put them together is to position the ingredients in a small rectangle on the bottom half of a round tortilla. Fold in two sides until they meet in the centre. Fold the bottom of the tortilla to the centre over the filling, and continue rolling until there is no more wrap left to roll.

Pitas can be stuffed or folded in half over the filling, then wrapped tightly in aluminum foil.

Lavash, that wonderful Middle Eastern flat bread, should be heated flat in the oven with the ingredients spread on top to soften it before you roll it. Fold in about 1 inch of each short end to keep the filling from leaking out. Then roll the bread tightly, starting on one of the long sides. Cut into portion-sized lengths.

TURKEY AND VEGETABLE WRAP

If you want a tasty vegetarian wrap, you can make this without the turkey.

1 large sheet of lavash
1 cup tomato sauce
1 cup mild salsa
½ lb. fresh spinach leaves
½ lb. roasted turkey breast, thinly sliced
1 red pepper, thinly sliced
1 red onion, thinly sliced
1 small zucchini, thinly sliced

Preheat the oven to 350. Place the lavash on a sheet pan and brush with the tomato sauce. Spoon the salsa over the sauce. Layer on the spinach leaves, followed by the turkey breast, red pepper, onion and zucchini. Heat in the oven, about 5 minutes. Fold in the sides of the lavash. Then roll the lavash tightly, starting with the long end. Let cool for 5 minutes before cutting into 4 portions. Serves 4.

SPICY CHICKEN AND PAPAYA WRAP WITH COLESLAW

¼ head each red and green cabbage, finely shredded
½ bunch cilantro, chopped
4 green onions, sliced
1 to 2 tbsp. hot sauce
juice of 1 orange juice of 1 lime
2 tbsp. sesame oil
½ lb. cooked chicken or turkey, julienned (you can use leftovers)
1 ripe papaya, peeled and diced
4 large flour tortillas or lavash

In a large bowl, combine cabbage, cilantro and green onions and toss. Add hot sauce, orange and lime juices and sesame oil. Mix thoroughly. Add chicken and toss. Divide the salad and chicken mixture between 4 wraps. Sprinkle the top with the diced papaya. Fold in the sides, then the bottom, and then continue rolling up. Makes 4 servings. This recipe can be doubled or tripled. This recipe can also be stuffed into a pita.

ASIAN CHICKEN WRAPS

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 lb. boneless skinless chicken breast cut into strips
½ cup shredded carrots
1 cup snow pea pods
½ cup chopped celery
⅓ cup teriyaki sauce
4 large flour tortilla
4 red leaf lettuce leaves
1 tbsp. 1 tsp. chopped cilantro

Heat oil in wok or large skillet; add chicken. Stir-fry until lightly browned and no longer pink, about 5 minutes. Add the carrots, celery and snow pea pods; stir-fry 1 minute. Stir in the sauce; cook until the mixture is thoroughly heated. Place a lettuce leaf on each tortilla; add some chicken mixture. Sprinkle the top of the chicken with the cilantro. Fold up bottom third of tortilla. Fold in the sides and then roll the tortilla enclosing filling. Serve with additional sauce, if desired. Serves 4. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

SPICY CREAM CHEESE ROLL-UP

1 8-oz. package cream cheese softened
1 16-oz. jar salsa, drained
1 small jar green chilies jar drained
1 can sliced black olives drained
½ cup chopped red bell pepper
10 large flour tortilla

In large mixing bowl, combine the cream cheese, drained salsa, green chilies, red pepper and olives. On each tortilla, spread about ½ cup of the filling mixture. Roll tortilla up tightly jelly-roll fashion. Wrap in plastic wrap. Refrigerate at least 2 hours or until chilled. Serves 4. This recipe can be made into an appetizer. Just cut each tortilla roll into 7 to 8 slices and serve it on a platter.

Jewelry that's different – and not mass-produced

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

"The pearl is the queen of gems and the gem of queens." The unknown author of this quote saw the unique beauty of the pearl, but probably couldn't foresee a time when pearls would have such wide appeal.

One who knows the true beauty of the pearl is Eileen Silberzweig of Eileen's Pearls (416-630-1463). Her talent is in the stringing and restringing of pearls, coral, Venetian glass and other beads. She is highly skilled at what she does and thoroughly enjoys it.

"I love jewelry – it's part of our lives," says Silberzweig. "If any kind of necklace you're wearing needs restringing, this is the place for it."

Silberzweig has honed her skills for more than 30 years. When she first started working for a jewelry shop and was required to do repairs, she saw the potential in setting up a business, with her two teenage daughters. Like a pearl from an oyster, the business grew, to be featured on television and in many articles. Silberzweig has earned her place in the industry as the woman to go to for all stringing and redesigning needs.

Both of her daughters, Sandra Silberzweig, a gemologist, and Susan Silberzweig Korman have, since their teens, been active in Eileen's Pearls.

"My mother taught herself how to restring," says Silberzweig Korman, adding that "no one has ever walked out of here saying 'you couldn't help us.'"

Silberzweig strings only with thread, explaining that wire has a tendency to buckle up and stay that way. Her stock includes thousands of findings, so if something's broken, there's no need to invest in the whole piece.

She travels extensively, bringing back interesting beads and stones acquired in Italy or Israel. Adds Silberzweig Korman, "She buys in bulk – it lowers the price. Since she's in the business, she can go into places others can't."

Brides like to get something different and new, and Silberzweig can either design pieces or redesign existing settings. Eileen's Pearls also has an extensive collection of pieces that will match perfectly or complement any heirloom.

In the last few years, the pearl industry has changed dramatically, offering new shapes and colours of pearls. "People are willing to wear more exotic things, but if it's the right colour for you, it radiates," says Silberzweig Korman.

Odyssey Jewellery Designers Inc., (905-737-5266) is a more than 50-year-old family-run business specializing in top-of-the-line jewelry. It's designed to a client's specifications and made with the highest quality materials. Remarkably, Odyssey can maintain this high level of quality without charging the highest prices.

Odyssey's owner Ed Hostick says, "I've been in the business my whole life." Working with his father, Milton, who started the business, the junior Hostick developed a keen eye for style and beauty in jewelry design.

Odyssey has a beautifully stocked showroom. All work and repairs are done on the premises. If a look through the store doesn't produce that most sought-after piece, customizing one is an option.

"We do a lot of work where people bring in their own settings and we renovate them," says Hostick.

Most of the stock in the store are original pieces of jewelry, with the remainder made up of unique imported pieces. "We like to have things that are different," says Hostick. They include pink sapphires, black diamonds and pink gold, which is currently undergoing a renewed popularity. Pavé pieces set in diamonds with white gold or platinum are also currently fashionable.

The classics, including rubies, emeralds or sapphires set in two-tone gold, are expertly produced with a pride of workmanship only those trained in their field have. Appraisals are also done on the premises.

A wide selection of engagement rings are available in matching sets. They are perfect for the moment that the question is popped. After all, what better way to start a new relationship than by establishing one – with a trusted jeweller?

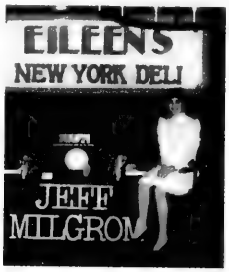
Flashing back to big hair and gaudy fashions

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The bar or bat mitzvah is an age-old rite of passage, but "it is also a crafty sleight of hand – a brilliant attempt to persuade 13-year-olds to ignore the trauma of their early teens by unilaterally proclaiming them to be fully fledged men and women overnight."

"Y.M.C.A.!" — 1991.



"Most people's themes are their hobbies. Apparently my mother thought mine was 'New York Deli.' But it didn't matter… the DJ's name was bigger than mine. Most of the guests probably thought it was his bat mitzvah." – Eileen Quast, 1985.

This according to the introduction to Bar Mitzvah Disco by Roger Bennett, Jules Shell and Nick Kroll, a colourful collection of bar mitzvah photos and witty anecdotes from (mostly American) Jews who came of age from the late 1970s through the early 1990s.

"In modern times," the introduction continues, "this ritualized act of self-deception has become a parallel universe, two parts Fantasy Island and one part Vegas, rife with its gorgeous girls, piles of cash and hastily scribbled thank you notes."

In part, this book attempts to trace the evolution of the modern bar mitzvah party, an "examination of who we are and how we got to be this way."

The project began on an Internet website – as thousands of people sent in their photos and memories – and it soon morphed into this collection.

Mostly, the book is a fun look back at gaudy '70s and '80s fashions. What were we thinking?

Gotta love those three-piece suits, wide collars and ties, guys. On the girls, puffy sleeves, and big, big hair were a must.

"This is a gallery of bar/bat mitzvah fashion evergreens that never go out of style – shoulder pads, asymmetrical hemlines, gaping cleavages and the calm, safe waters of ruffles, ruffles and more ruffles."

This book makes a great coffee table book for any Gen X-er suffering from bad flashbacks. And it's got a forward by the Village People. Really.

Published by Random House of Canada, Bar Mitzvah Disco is available for $33.95.

Cheers… and stay away from magnets — 1986.

"I am getting the most action I had ever received in this shot. Hence the extreme widening of the mouth. I had never had three grown men look up my skirt before. Two of them were my closest friends' fathers. That made it even dirtier." — Elissa Bowes, 1990.

No idea what these fine folks are up to. But I do love Dad's suit. — 1973

Spa-ing the day away

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

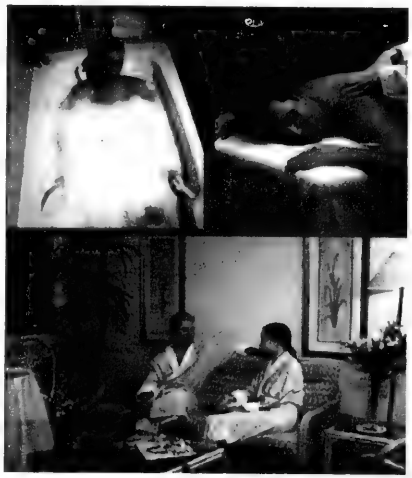
Life can be so stressful that 24 hours in a day doesn't even seem enough to get everything done. Ah, then there's that thing we like to call the spa: a place where all your cares can drift away and you can experience a state of peace.

Uptown Spa (416-449-4044, www.uptownspa.com) has been offering such a place for the last 10 years.

A complete day spa, Uptown offers everything from massage and botox injections to laser hair removal. The 7,000-square-foot facility also offers manicures, pedicures, electrolysis and hair services. At Uptown, you can treat yourself to the perfect enriching spa experience.

The family-owned business, run by Anne Sorenson, has a laid-back environment. A trained staff of 40 cater to your every need – Uptown Spa has it all. The staff has been there for years, and all have great relationships with the clients. "Our clients really love it here," says Sorenson.

Uptown's facials and body scrubs are widely known as spa specialties, among the many services offered. As well, people come far and wide for massage, which includes hot-stone treatments and private whirlpool. Ah, divine.



Relaxing at the Uptown Spa.

Among Uptown Spa's loyal customers are young professional women who enjoy a manicure like nothing else. As well, Uptown has embraced the trend of male customers at the spa. "We've offered men's services since the beginning, so we're happy to continue," says Sorenson. Men's services include massages, manicures and pedicures.

Uptown Spa is the perfect place to kick up your heels and take a load off. With the staff's personal touch, they promise to make your experience as pleasurable as possible. "It's an extremely welcoming place," says Sorenson.

"Video is no longer just another expense. It is a valuable family heirloom that lasts beyond all other products and services at your event," Israel says.

"Video is the only medium that can bring the life of the celebration back again any time."

That's why it's important to hire a professional when choosing a videographer, he says.

Israel offers a strong commitment to high standards and fine workmanship using high tech, up-to-date and reliable equipment.

When choosing a videographer, he says, it's important to ask a lot of questions so that you'll be comfortable with your choice. A visit to Israel's website, www.videobyjosh.com, will answer most questions you might have, and it will even give you advice on what questions to ask your potential videographer.

These days, clients often want a videographer who seems almost invisible at their event, and Israel says he goes to great lengths to make sure his camera work is done in a pleasing and mature manner. Lighting is also a factor. Israel uses top-of-the-line dimmers on all his lights to create an unobtrusive environment.

Video Productions by Josh (905-709-9277) is also fully digital. From camera work to editing to DVDs, Israel uses the cleanest digital path, resulting in the best images in the trade. Israel uses state-of-the-art cameras and equipment. He records using Sony's high-end digital DVCAM format, which he says provides superior picture clarity, colour, contrast, brightness and sound compared to DV, S-VHS & Betacam-SP.

> 'Video is the only medium that can bring the life of the celebration back'

When asked how far ahead clients should book their videographer, Israel says it's important to book as far ahead as possible. Bar and bat mitzvahs are often booked two years in advance, he adds.

Josh has built a solid reputation in the Jewish community. He has been personally videotaping and editing weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs since 1979, and notes that he understands the needs and timelines of the more observant parts of the community, as he has been videotaping Orthodox weddings for many years.

He has also built solid relationships with caterers and venues throughout the city, as he has taped and edited more than 2,300 family events.

Israel stresses the importance of the phrase, "You get what you pay for."

"Our prices are realistic," he says "They are quite reasonable, especially when considering the time spent videotaping and editing mainly during valuable weekends and holidays, the higher-grade very costly equipment, the expertise and finer workmanship.

"We do not cut corners and we will not disappoint you. Better workmanship and a finer final product are always worth more."

Tips on picking a consultant

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Nowadays many people use the services of planners to organize major celebrations like weddings.

Gayle Kertzman of Gayle Kertzman Wedding & Special Events Planning (416-892-1240; website www.gaylekertzman.com) explains why: "You face a lot of decisions in a short time. Whether you're choosing a hall, band, invitations, clothes, menus or décor, the choices can be overwhelming. And you only have one chance to do it right."

But you also have to select your planner. Kertzman has some useful tips on how to choose and work with a planner; so do Sarah Cherry and Marsha Baker of Cherry & Baker and Associates (905-771-1121).

"A planner," says Kertzman, "lets you relax and be a guest at your own party. You can let someone else take care of things." Basically, this is Cherry's and Baker's viewpoint, too.

Cherry and Baker are full partners who know each other's files, get along well and have fun at their work. The greatest compliment, for Baker, is that a client has invited her to an event as a guest.

Cherry and Baker identify three crucial qualities in a planner: experience, organization and rapport. Of these, they say, rapport with the client matters most.

Experience counts, too. Kertzman as well as Cherry and Baker have been tried and tested in difficult situations and built solid reputations.

"Some clients want more guidance, some want less," Cherry observes.

"For this reason," Baker takes up the thread, "we offer a full package where we do all the planning, and a 'day-of' package where the client does more on their own."

Kertzman also offers packages. "Some people," she says, "do a lot of the work themselves. Only then do they come to me, often about three months before the event. Others come earlier, a year or so ahead – they usually want me to do more.

"Ideally, you should book my services for a wedding when you get engaged. Over a year or so, I can develop excellent rapport with a client."

Baker also urges that you book your planner as far ahead as possible. "We're already booked into 2008," she says.

Kertzman has noticed that many people think holding an event at home will help keep the planning simple. "Not necessarily," she warns. "A shul, hall or hotel is set up for events like weddings."

Besides weddings, Kertzman does showers, brises, baby namings, and bar and bat mitzvahs. "I want to build a long-term relationship with each client," she says. "And I go to every event myself, rather than send an assistant. I often bring an assistant, sometimes two, but as an extra pair of hands."

Cherry and Baker don't always attend an event. "If we're not there, though," Cherry promises, "our staff has to be as good as we are."

"And as involved," Baker adds.

"If someone says our staff is better than we are," Cherry says, laughing, "we take it as a compliment."

A grand event like a wedding usually means a 12-hour day for Kertzman. "Seeing hosts and guests happy, and building a lasting clientele, make the work worthwhile," she says.

"Pay a lot of attention to logistics," Kertzman advises. "As a planner, I make logistics and organization my strong point."

"We tailor the event to your style and needs," says Cherry. "It's your event, not ours."

Baker adds, "There's no such thing as a typical 'Cherry & Baker' event."

Cherry and Baker are honest but give advice tactfully, and they recommend that you respect their expertise. In essence, this is Kertzman's viewpoint as well. Know what you want, she advises, but be flexible, and ready to adapt.

"At your party," Kertzman says, "you're the monarch, but a wise ruler listens to her [or his] councillors and knows how to delegate. You simply can't do everything yourself."

Or as Cherry and Baker say, "The client draws the big picture – we fill in the details."

Not long ago, when it came to organizing weddings, one could have said "queen" instead of the gender-neutral "monarch." Nowadays, Kertzman sees a lot more men taking an active interest in planning the big day.

"This trend is through the whole party industry," she observes. "It's good, it's the way things should be, but it can make the planning more complicated."

"At an event like a wedding, which marks a major passage in life," Baker points out, "the hosts and guests are feeling things very intensely. The planner, in contrast, should be mellow.

"Always," says Baker, speaking with the voice of experience, "something unpredictable comes up. The client shouldn't have to know about it, though, till after the event – that is, after the problem's already been solved. And you shouldn't try to micro-manage. It takes away from having fun at your own event."

Determine your budget carefully, Cherry and Baker urge. A good planner will work within your means, and as they point out, more money doesn't always mean a better function. It's not how much – it's how you put it to use. On this point too, though, they suggest that you be flexible if you can.

As a professional makeup artist, Baker can offer that special extra, seemingly a small thing that can matter a lot. She knows, for instance, how different types of cosmetic appear in different kinds of lighting.

Millcroft Inn's spa offers massage and beauty treatments

It takes just a 40-minute drive northwest from Toronto to find yourself in the lap of luxury at the Millcroft Inn & Spa in picturesque Alton, Ont.

Surrounded by the woodlands of Caledon Hills, the Millcroft Inn (1-800-383-3976 or www.millcroft.com), a former knitting mill, has long been a favourite getaway for couples, wedding parties and corporate events.

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Last year, the Millcroft Centre for Well-Being, the inn's 9,000-square-foot spa, was completed. It has become a busy spa resort destination, hosting both overnight guests and day-spa visitors.

The spa has four levels. Painted a crisp white, it is warmed up by dark-stained wood trim and beams and a rich burgundy broadloom with black accents.

The spa features 17 treatment rooms, including a Japanese couple's room, where the traditional Japanese bath ritual known as ofuro is offered. There is the Vichy shower room, offering body treatments under a rain shower, and a Swiss Shower Treatment Kurs, with a 12-jet spray known for its benefits on muscles and circulation – a signature treatment of the spa. The interior of these rooms is enhanced with either navy blue or burgundy trim and matching ceilings. Scenic prints and abstract artwork throughout the spa liven the space.

The décor of the spa mimics the quaintness of the Millcroft Inn's Main Mill, which houses 22 of the inn's 52 award-winning guest rooms, in addition to a dining room, which overlooks a stunning waterfall, a front reception area and a lounge. Other accommodations at the inn include the Manor House, adjacent to the Main Mill. Many of the rooms have Jacuzzi tubs. There are also self-contained two-storey chalets located by the spa and the outdoor pool.

The Inn is a busy spa resort destination, hosting overnight guests and day-visitors.

Basking in the lap of luxury

The spa features men and women's lockers, each with saunas and showers. There is an indoor resistance pool and hot tub, a well-equipped fitness studio, a café and the Woodlands Lounge, where, on chilly days, spa goers can relax on comfortable grey couches in front of a wood-burning fireplace before and after their spa treatments. In the summer, clients can enjoy a walk through the spa's labyrinth healing garden, a maze chock-full of fragrant botanicals.

Twenty therapists minister to guests' needs at the spa. The staff includes registered massage therapists, aroma therapists, reflexologists and estheticians.

Treatments include a number of different facials, from the popular customized Millcroft Spa Facial to the Age-Defying Facial, which includes the Biodroga Oxygen Power Skin Treatment from the German skin-care line Biodroga Systems.

Catering to the growing interest in spa treatments for men, the spa has developed a number of treatments for gentlemen, including a specialty facial, says head esthetician Pamela Crust.

Not to be missed is the Holistic Indian Head Massage, based on an ancient South Asian healing system. After 45 minutes under the healing hands of British massage therapist Melanie Pringle, stresses of the head and neck seem to melt away.

Products used include Ancient Secrets, Jane Eiredale, and the body line Frei from Germany.

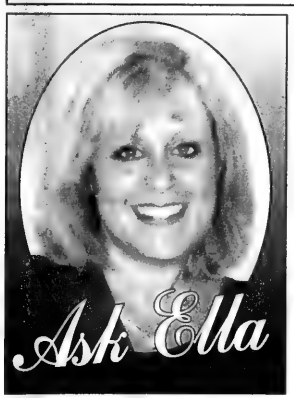
Other treatments offered include hot- stone massage, Thai massage, also known as "yoga for the lazy," reiki, reflexology, and Swedish, sports, prenatal and couples massage. Also on offer are body polishes and wraps, an array of hand and foot treatments, makeup applications and waxing. Many of the treatments offer deluxe extras for that little extra bit of pampering.

Treatments are available à la carte or as part of a day-spa or overnight package. The spa concierges will gladly custom-create spa packages exclusively for you.

In addition to Biodroga System, products used at the spa include Ancient Secrets, a body line from Vancouver that uses algae and Canadian glacial clay as ingredients; Jane Eiredale, an American makeup line; nail polishes from OPI; and the body line Frei from Germany. Retail beauty products are sold in the spa's reception area.

When you're not being pampered, other activities available for guests include bike riding, hiking, cross-country skiing, ice skating on the mill's pond, tennis, indoor and outdoor golf, and shopping nearby.

About Life



Dear Ella,

My cousin recently made a bar mitzvah. I got the invitation well in advance and put the date aside. I naturally assumed my husband and I were invited with our son, as I knew all the other kids in the family were invited. Granted, my son is only two years old, while the other children are a bit older.

The weekend before the affair, my cousin called to make sure I was not bringing my son. She said she was not allowing small children to attend the simchah.

I was very upset and almost didn't go. My husband and I decided that that he would stay home with our son and I would go on my own. When I got there, I was seated at a table with a couple who had a baby with them. I was livid. Should I confront my cousin or just never speak to her again?

No Kids Allowed

Dear No Kids Allowed

When someone is making a simchah, they are entitled to invite whomever they wish. If your cousin wanted to have an affair without small children and that's the reason she told you to leave your son at home, then you did the right thing to respect her wishes. However, once you arrived and found another couple with a baby there, you were entitled to an explanation. But don't jump to conclusions without speaking to your cousin. It's very possible the other couple decided to bring their child against her wishes. If that's the case, she is not to blame.

You do, however, have a right to ask her about it. Once you receive an answer, you can decide whether or not you are comfortable with her explanation. Armed with this information, you then have the choice of whether to speak your mind and discuss the issue with your cousin or not.

Remember, it's not so easy to go back once you burn a bridge, so don't make your decision lightly. Wait until you calm down, so you can think and speak rationally and not emotionally. I sincerely hope you and your cousin can work out this misunderstanding and continue to coexist in the same family.

Kosher catering offers as much variety as non-kosher

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

With more caterers and banquet halls setting up shop every year, it's getting harder to figure out who plans an event best. Two Toronto caterers have one selling point that many of these newer party planners don't – they've got history on their side.

"My mom started the company about 30 years ago," says Jack Ponte, manager of L'echaim Catering (416-650-5440). "She used to really enjoy cooking, so she decided to try her hand at catering."

"We've been in business for 50 years," says Sharon Firestone, co-owner of Caterers York. "It started with my father. He was probably the first kosher caterer in Toronto."

With such storied pasts, these two catering companies have seen trends come and go, but one recent craze, says Ponte, could have a positive effect on his business.

"In the past, people had this idea that if it was kosher, maybe it wasn't as good, or variety wasn't available. Now you can basically do anything kosher you can do non-kosher. You can get the fake shrimp and the fake crab. There are more kosher caterers than ever before too, but people now realize that if it's kosher, it can be just as good as non-kosher."

"There's a lot of kosher wine being offered now," says Firestone. "There are wines from Italy, Australia, Israel and even from California."

"Years ago, there was just Carmel, Carmel, Carmel," says Ponte. "There's a huge variety of wines and some higher quality ones, too. In the past, and I have no idea why, people tended to bring their own wine or liquor to parties instead of buying it from the hall. Some people still do that, but [more people] are buying from the venue."

Besides more kosher options, one significant catering change that Firestone's had to adapt to is the increasing amount of people with allergies.

"There are a lot of dietary restrictions. There are many meals where people have allergies. They have nut allergies, or they're diabetic, so in any party we can be doing 10 or 12 different kinds of meals," she says.

> Kosher catering is always in high demand

Despite increased allergies and more kosher competition, these two companies haven't slowed down. Both have exclusive kosher catering contracts at major venues – Caterers York plans functions at the Beth Tzedec synagogue, while L'echaim is gearing up to cater functions at Le Jardin, a recently renovated banquet hall located in Woodbridge, Ont..

"Le Jardin is an absolutely stunning facility," says Ponte. "It holds about 100 people in one of their banquet halls and about 700 in another."

Firestone admits that with more places like Le Jardin vying for your functions, the catering world is getting competitive. But she adds that a synagogue is still the best place to have a major life event.

"A synagogue is a religious place and if you're having a life-cycle event, it should be done there. We have a beautiful lobby, a great dining room and we do an excellent job."

> The catering world is getting competitive

No matter where your party takes place, Firestone says people want good food and a good price.

"Budget is very important. We deal with a full range, from a really nice simple meal, to something more substantial," she says.

Ponte agrees, but says just having a kosher function means the price will be higher.

"There are inherent costs that you get with kosher catering. Kosher meat and poultry is always more expensive. The process starts when the animal is killed and the process of making it kosher adds to the cost of the meat at the end of the line. You've got more labour involved so it's a little more time consuming. These are steps that don't normally happen in non-kosher food.

"Is it tremendously more expensive? I don't think it has to be tremendously more than non-kosher food. It all depends on menu selection. You can also pay $200 a plate on a non-kosher meal."

Kosher catering is always in high demand for weddings or bar/bat mitzvahs, but Caterers York and L'echaim Caterers do more than just the traditional simchahs.

"There is a kosher market for golf tournaments," says Ponte. "They do tend to go to some of the nicer golf clubs around, but they're there. We target some conventions."

"We do a lot of brises and baby namings," says Firestone. "They're really popular – that's new over the last couple years. They also bring in people in large numbers – like over 100 people. They used to have a couple of people, but now it's become a real big celebration."

With a combined 80 years' experience, both L'echaim Catering and Caterers York know how to plan a great function.

Other kosher caterers advertising in this supplement are: Ely's Fine Foods, 416-782-3231; King Solomon's Catering, 416-630-1666; Miriam's Table Inc., 416-633-6554; Royal Kosher Catering, 416-971-9666.

Good MCs can rock your party 'no matter what'

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If there is a magic word a DJ or MC needs to put into practice at a party, it's "interaction," says Eric Bouaziz, CEO of Starr Productions.

"A DJ and MC needs to be able to first and foremost interact with the kids and adults," Bouaziz says.

"Guests will be eager to get up and dance when they have someone working with them."

So when planning an event, he recommends looking for an MC whose personality will energize the crowd.

"The personality is huge," Bouaziz says.

"The client needs to look for a high-energy person… who's able to have a natural flair with the music and knows how to work the floor."

The MC and DJ work as a team, with the DJ spinning the music and the MC as the person on the microphone, revving on the guests.

Bouaziz adds that it's important for the DJ to have a wide array of music at their fingertips and to cater to what the clients and guests request. Daniel Miller, for example, is one of Starr Productions' leading MCs and is in high demand.

These days, music trends, particularly among bar and bat mitzvah-aged kids, are blasting back to the past.

"Classic rock is popular with boys in particular," says Jian Magen of Magen Boys Entertainment.

"What was old is now the 'new.'"

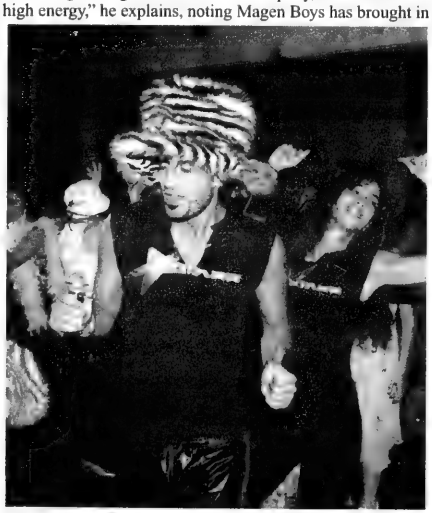
To spice up the production, DJs and MCs can be accompanied by dancers or even live singers.

"There's usually a range of two to four dancers, and when the MC has them working with him, you have a full production," says Bouaziz.

"The dancers can give away prizes and they help keep the kids busy."

Magen says his company offers a wide roster of professional dancers and can also enlist professional entertainers to spruce up the affair.

"A singer brings a live element to the party, and we stand for high energy," he explains, noting Magen Boys has brought in such performers as hip hop singers, keyboard players or even an AC/DC tribute band.



Guests will be eager to get up and dance when they have someone working with them.

Weddings are somewhat different from bar mitzvahs in terms of how the DJ and MC's use their talent.

"The music selection is different at a wedding – you can be more artistic with it," Bouaziz says.

Both Bouaziz and Magen agree that weddings require a more "classy and elegant" feel, and DJs and MCs need to foster that.

In preparing for your function, be sure to consult with the DJ to ensure that your vision for the affair plays out.

"We have a preliminary meeting with the client, an event itinerary meeting where we go over the schedule and then a full meeting for music selection," Bouaziz explains.

"The DJ works with the client for suggested songs that will apply to their guests and will be appropriate for candlelightings at bar and bat mitzvahs."

Ultimately, when choosing who will be the DJ and MC, Bouaziz says experience really does matter, so get references from friends and family.

"An experienced MC will be able to keep the event going no matter what happens," Bouaziz says.

"And when you have an MC and DJ that have worked together for years, the same team will get better and better. They become a crew."

One-stop shopping

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Tyme to Party has become known for its simchah baskets.

Are you planning a simchah on your own and have a to-do list that's three miles long? Well, you can save yourself time and money and daily migraines if you do all your shopping at a one-stop party shop.

Two large retail outlets geared to simchahs of all sizes are Tyme to Party (905-737-2789), at 10303 Yonge St. in Richmond Hill, and Party Supply Depot (905-764-5457), located at 92 Doncaster Ave. in Thornhill.

Norene and Harvey Norris are a husband-and-wife team that run Tyme to Party with their daughter and son-in-law. The store, which opened in 1998, covers 9,000 square feet over three floors.

The second floor is devoted to costumes, with a large selection geared to Jewish-themed outfits for Purim. The first floor is for loot bags and the basement is devoted to bar and bat mitzvahs.

Tyme to Party offers a one-stop service for invitations, centrepieces, custom loot bags and balloon decorating.

"We have the whole nine yards," says Norene Norris. "Whatever you need for any simchah, we probably carry it."

Tyme to Party has become known for its simchah baskets, which are used as centrepieces and then donated to a children's charity. The baskets, which start at $25, are colour co-ordinated for the function.

"We do non-food simchah baskets," explains Norris. "We can use plush animals, books, wipe-free markers, radios, bean pillows.... Then we do the whole thing up. It teaches children about giving."

She delivers the baskets to the simchah venue and the party host goes on to donate the "centrepieces" to charities like Jewish Family & Child Service and the Hospital for Sick Children.

"It's wrapped and beautifully presented. I also can attach balloons. It depends on the budget," Norris says, noting the baskets can be used for evening affairs or luncheons.

She stresses that she's on hand to supervise all decorating activities such as balloon décor or the more traditional centrepiece design. "I do absolutely everything. I'm always on site to make sure it's perfect."

Tyme to Party offers a wide selection of what's become de rigueur for bar or bat mitzvah parties – giveaways.

These novelty items have come down in price since glow necklaces were first introduced to the bar and bat mitzvah scene about 10 years ago, she says. "The glow necklaces were $3 a piece. Today they're about 50 cents."

She advises parents to involve their children in selecting the giveaways.

Norris encourages her clients to make appointments with her so she can take the time to help them plan their simchahs. "This way I can give them my full attention."

She says she gets a lot of referrals through word of mouth.

Norris advises her clients is to watch their costs . "I always tell them, 'You'll really enjoy your simchah if you stay within your budget and you do what your budget allows.'"

Mel Grevler, president of Party Supply Depot, says his store offers a wide variety of products and services at very competitive prices.

"People come to us because we are well priced and we have the right combination of products and services at a very fair price.

"Our staff is well trained. They have been with us for years. They can answer any question for events large and small."

One-stop shopping saves time — and migraines too

The store has expanded since its opening in 1990. Today, it occupies 12,000 square feet.

"We have pretty much everything you'll ever need for entertaining large or small crowds, says Grevler. "We cater to weddings, bar mitzvahs and all kinds of parties."

The Party Supply Depot offers Purim costumes and a full range of party loot and custom loot bags. Grevler says Party Supply Depot carries whatever is current and popular with children.

He stresses that his store is a great place for shopping for bar and bat mitzvah giveaways.

The store is also known for its huge selection of disposable tableware, from plastic and paper plates to printed and plain table covers, he says. "We import plastic tableware from all over the world.

"From the cheapest to the most exciting products, you can find them here. Anything that goes onto the table to make it more decorative or more functional."

Grevler says Party Supply Depot also has a very large catering section, "with platters and bowls for every budget and chafing rack warmers to keep food warm."

The store is also known for its large packaging selection, which includes paper packaging and all kinds of paper gift-wrap. "One of our specialties is gigantic bags for huge gifts. The bags are 46 inches, which is great for gifts like duvets and large baby toys.

A great place for shopping for bar and bat mitzvah gifts

"We carry products for every season. We have a huge range of Chanukah items and gift-wrap."

Party Supply Depot also offers customized banners, says Grevler. "We are very competitively priced. Banners six feet long by 19 inches wide start at $29.99."

Party Supply Depot will decorate for simchahs with balloons and centrepieces. However, helium balloons can also be obtained at the last minute for do-it-yourselfers.

Grevler stresses the importance of keeping to a budget, so he and the Party Supply Depot staff try to help customers save money, wherever possible.

"Sometimes it's more economical to rent a helium tank and blow up your own balloons," he says.

Wedding party attendants have responsibilities

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Although weddings are usually family affairs, friends play a large role in people's lives, and brides and grooms want their friends to be as excited about their wedding plans as they are themselves. But it is a good idea to choose close dependable friends to participate in your wedding, as they are expected to take on certain responsibilities and should be informed of this beforehand.

The first time my daughter Karyn was asked to be an attendant at a friend's wedding, she admits it was flattering and she got caught up in the excitement as friends shared their plans with her and the other members of the wedding party. She was honoured and happy to participate and went out of her way to fulfil her responsibilities as an attendant and in planning and helping with any festivities.

However, in retrospect (she was an attendant at more than a dozen weddings) she now realizes the physical and financial toll it took on her personally. She did not always reside in the same city as the bride and groom, and she incurred travel and accommodation expenses. She also had to schedule time away from her studies when she was at university, and when she started working, arrange to take vacation and long weekends to coincide with the pre-wedding activities and the wedding.

Wedding etiquette dictates that the maid of honour, the bridesmaids and the groomsmen are responsible for an assortment of tasks besides walking down the aisle on the day of the wedding. Pre-wedding responsibilities for the maid of honour might include addressing invitations, planning pre-wedding parties, hosting a bridal shower, maybe even helping to organize the reception.

Then, at the wedding there are other duties, such as helping the bride dress and being prepared for all emergencies with extra nylons, makeup, food, etc. In some cases, she may help organize the dancing and the horahs.

Bridesmaids may be asked to run errands for the bride and join with the maid of honour in hosting a shower and arranging for a bachelorette party. Groomsmen (best man and ushers) are expected to organize a bachelor party and pay for it, and to be available the day of the wedding to attend to any last-minute details for the groom.

As well, attendants are expected to pay for their own clothing, travel and accommodation expenses. However, although they may attend all pre-wedding parties, only one shower gift and one wedding gift are expected.

"You want to be all things to your friends," says Karyn, who has travelled to the United States and Australia in support of her friends as well as being an attendant at home in Montreal, "but there are sometimes rather high personal and financial expenses involved in being part of a wedding party."

The maid of honour and bridesmaids have to get themselves ready with the purchase of a gown selected by the bride or having one made in the colour of the bride's choice, which entails scheduling time for fittings; and the groom's attendants are expected to go for fittings of tuxedos and pay for rental of all the necessary paraphernalia, including shoes if needed.

"I have done everything as a wedding attendant, from just showing up to arranging engagement parties, gown shopping with the bride, organizing staggettes [bachelorette parties], and even table seating," says Karyn, who understands that her friends may not be able to reciprocate when it is her turn at the altar.

"You shouldn't expect payback," she adds, "and if you've accepted to be in the [wedding] party, you need to be supportive, and depending on the relationship, help out by documenting each event with photographs, keeping gift lists or helping to set up and clean up."

Karyn admits that although she has spent a small fortune over the years for the honour of being part of her friends' weddings, she is glad she could be there for them.

Chocolate chip cookies always a favourite

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Chocolate chip cookies are easy to make, and they're a great addition to any party meal. The following are some of my favourites. Each recipe makes 2½ to 3 dozen cookies.

CHEWY CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

2 sticks (1 cup) unsalted butter
2¼ cups bread flour
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. baking soda
¼ cup white granulated sugar
1¼ cups brown sugar
1 egg
1 egg yolk
2 tbsp. milk
1½ tsp. vanilla extract
2 cups semisweet chocolate chips

Heat oven to 375. Melt the butter in a heavy-bottom medium saucepan over low heat. Sift together the flour, salt, and baking soda and set aside. Pour the melted butter in the mixer's work bowl. Add the sugar and brown sugar. Cream the butter and sugars on medium speed. Add the egg, yolk, 2 tbsp. milk and vanilla extract and mix until well combined. Slowly incorporate the flour mixture until thoroughly combined. Stir in the chocolate chips. Chill the dough, then scoop onto parchment-lined baking sheets, 6 cookies per sheet. Bake for 14 minutes or until golden brown, checking the cookies after 5 minutes. Rotate the baking sheet for even browning. Cool completely and store in an airtight container.

PUFFY CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

1 cup butter-flavored shortening
¼ cup white granulated sugar
1 cup brown sugar
2¼ cups cake flour
1 tsp. salt
1½ tsp. baking powder
2 eggs
1½ tsp. vanilla extract
2 cups semisweet chocolate chips

Heat oven to 375. Combine the shortening, sugar, and brown sugar in the mixer's work bowl and cream until light and fluffy.

In the meantime, sift together the cake flour, salt and baking powder and set aside.

Add the eggs 1 at a time to the creamed mixture. Then add vanilla. Increase the speed until thoroughly incorporated. With the mixer set to low, slowly add the dry ingredients to the shortening and combine well. Stir in the chocolate chips.

Chill the dough. Scoop onto parchment-lined baking sheets, 6 per sheet. Bake for 13 minutes or until golden brown and puffy, checking the cookies after 5 minutes. Rotate the baking sheet for even browning. Cool and store in an airtight-container.

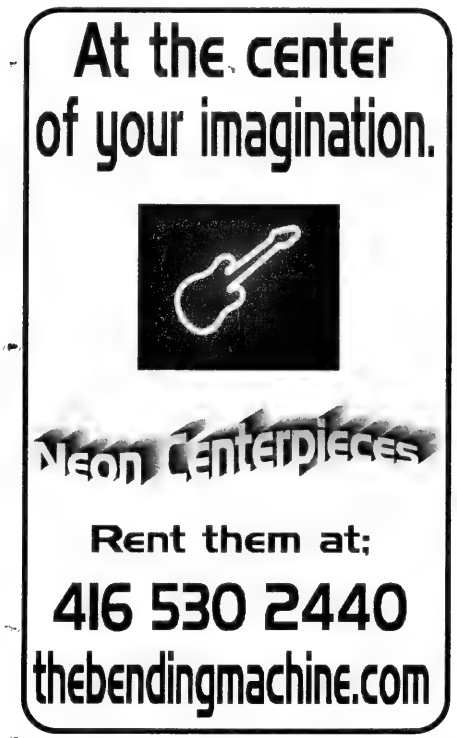
THIN CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

2¼ cups flour
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. baking soda
1 egg
2 oz. milk
1½ tsp. vanilla extract
2 sticks (1 cup) unsalted butter
1 cup white granulated sugar
½ cup brown sugar
2 cups semisweet chocolate chips

Heat oven to 375. Sift together the flour, salt, and baking soda in a mixing bowl. Combine the egg, milk, and vanilla and bring to room temperature in another bowl. Cream the butter in the mixer's work bowl, starting on low speed to soften the butter.

Add the sugars. Increase the speed, and cream the mixture until light and fluffy. Reduce the speed and add the egg mixture slowly. Increase the speed and mix until well combined. Slowly add the flour mixture, scraping the sides of the bowl until thoroughly combined. Stir in the chocolate chips. Scoop onto parchment-lined baking sheets, 6 cookies per sheet. Bake for 13 to 15 minutes, checking the cookies after 5 minutes.

Rotate the baking sheet for more even browning. Remove the cookies from the pans immediately. Once cooled, store in an airtight container.



Dog tags, fun photos make great giveaways

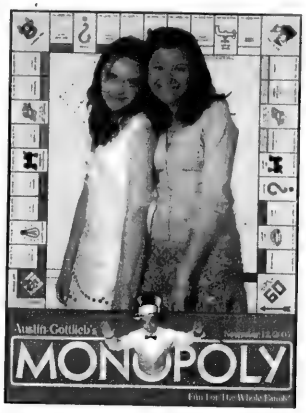
By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Tag, you're it! The youthful joy of engaging in a game of tag recurs time and again at many bar and bat mitzvahs, and sweet sixteens. Create A Tag owners David Litz and Cary Pomeranz have guests lining up for fun and personalized tags, made while you wait, at these events.

"We've got a couple of old antique embossing machines. It's exactly like you'd get in the army," says Litz.

All they need are a person's information filled out on a card, then a tag is imprinted and presto – the guest has an official-looking army dog tag.

They're a real hit with the kids.



Signature Studios can place people within pop-culture backdrops.

"We've done parties where we're the number one attraction," Litz adds.

"We're getting quite a few calls from schools. It's a form of identification for the kids as well."

One tag can hold up to 75 characters. The accompanying gasket comes in many different colours, along with a 24-inch ball chain.

Create A Tag can also create personalized items, such as hockey pucks that can be used as a smart thematic substitute for staid place cards at a bar mitzvah.

"It all depends on the theme of the party. It just happens to be the thing right now, I guess," notes Litz.

For more information on Create A Tag, call 416-432-6089.

Another fun giveaway for parties by Signature Studios places people in existing scenes using special effects and trick photography.

"We're the only [studio] that uses a green screen picture, so you can actually put people into anything," says owner Greg Dean.

A girl can fulfill a fantasy by being pictured standing next to actor Brad Pitt, or a person's head can be placed on someone else's body.

"We can do pretty much anything. That's why it's so much fun," Dean says.

Magazine covers can be used as frames so that anyone can become a cover girl or boy for the night. The cover of the Hockey News, for instance, is popular at bar mitzvahs, and with official-looking covers that even include bar codes, the effect is "100 per cent realistic," he says.

Photos can be tied into a party's theme, such as a recent 1920s-themed event in which partygoers posed in front of a circa-1920 building façade and were photographed in sepia tones.

Other fun frames include one that floats between two magnets, allowing the photo to be viewed from both the front and the back, and one that looks like a film strip.

"Each [effect] we do is custom-designed to that person's party or event," notes Dean. "Stuff like that is huge because everyone wants to be in the movies."

Guests don't have to wait long to see the results: from taking the picture to printing, the time elapsed is about two minutes.

To reach Signature Studios, call 416- 784-4488.

Another party favours company advertising in this supplement is: Eventworks, 416-482-3984.

Weddings abroad and adventure trips are hot travel trends

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

These days, finding a travel agency with experienced agents or one that offers a unique new service is unusual.

Luxe Destinations, a company that specializes in organizing weddings abroad, is a new service based in Toronto.

"We help brides and grooms choose resorts. We also have in-house travel agents to help guests book the trip for the wedding," said Luxe founder Tara Soloway.

The service doesn't end there. A company representative will even go to the resort to be there on the day of the wedding to ensure that all the arrangements have been made.

"We like to be a full-service company. We can even build a personal website for the bride and groom to update the guests about certain events."

Although Luxe has only been in business for a year, Soloway said she is pleasantly surprised at how quickly the business has grown.

"The fact of the matter is, there is nothing else like it around."

She said her company is meant to help alleviate the difficulty of planning a wedding abroad from home.

Luxe even has contacts with rabbis in the Caribbean, especially in Jamaica and Mexico.

"There are some really amazing synagogues in the Caribbean," Soloway said.

"Because I'm Jewish, planning Jewish weddings is my expertise."

She said while the Mayan Riviera along Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula has been a popular recent hot spot for people weddings and honeymoons, since Hurricane Wilma devastated the area last month, people may want to go somewhere else.

Luxe Destinations specializes in organizing weddings abroad.

"Now the hotels are in clean-up mode, but people like it there because a lot of the hotels are new and there is a lot of culture in Mexico."

She explained that some brides and grooms stay at the same resort with their guests until the big day. But once the wedding is over, some choose to honeymoon in the same area while staying at a different resort so they can have some privacy.

Soloway recommends that if you want to have your wedding abroad, you should begin planning about eight to 12 months in advance to make sure the hotel you want will be available and to make booking a flight easier.

She said it's also important to give guests time to make arrangements.

"You really need to give people enough time to plan and save money, especially for people who have kids."

She said groups are usually in the range of 40 to 50 people, but she said her company would be willing to take on a group of any size.

If a good, old fashioned vacation is what you're looking for and you want to deal with someone with a lot of experience in the travel industry, look no further than Fisher Fremont Travel.

The family-run business has been sending people on vacation since 1962.

"Forty-three years later we're still here," boasts Shelly Fremont.

"We're a full-service travel agency, and we take care of everything from booking airline tickets to cruises to family vacations and adventure holidays."

She said the Caribbean has always been the most popular destination for Canadians, but places to go have been limited this year because of all the hurricanes in the area.

She said a newer trend is trips that allow people to take part in many activities.

"People want to do something other than lying around like a beached whale."

She said her clients like to book trips where they can go bike riding, rafting and exploring.

"People are starting to get adventurous. People don't want to be simply lying in the sun anymore."

She said what separates her agency from others is the informality between her and her clients.

"We're dealing with second- and third-generation clients," she said. "I always make sure that before I book a trip, I want to meet them, because I can't tell them where to go and what to do if I don't know them."

She said she is not an order-taker. She explained that when people call with a specific request and want her to book over the phone, she is reluctant to do so because she is not perfectly confident that the trip they want is right for them.

"We take pride in fulfilling people's fantasies. I take a great deal of pride in what I do."

For more information about Luxe Destinations, call 416-536-7422. To reach Shelly Fremont at Fisher Fremont Travel Limited, call 416-481-3323.

Bandleader spearheads effort to form Vaughan arts council

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Entertainer and entrepreneur Rick Levine, a long-time Vaughan resident, is trying to establish an arts council for the city.

He said there is a need for a central agency to represent the many local artists in Vaughan and to provide an organized outlet for promoting the arts to a larger local audience – and even to tourists.

"Without an arts council, you've basically got an artistic element that's invisible to the community," Levine said, noting that most of Vaughan's budget for public facilities and resources is being spent on pools and arenas.

> Artistic element invisible to the community

"With an arts background myself, this is something I'm really aware of," Levine said.

"I initiated the Arts Vaughan project when I realized that there's a need to bring creative opportunities to the children of the community. Not everyone's into sports. Some people like to play in bands or dance," he said.

"We've had tremendous support from [Thornhill MP] Susan Kadis and [Thornhill MPP] Mario Racco," Levine said, adding that the goal is to create a non-profit organization at arms length from the city.

In addition to its artists, Vaughan is also home to several well-known artistic institutions.

The Thoreau Macdonald House was the home of J. E. H. Macdonald, founder of the Group of Seven artists. The McMichael Art Gallery in Kleinburg is renowned for its Group of Seven treasures, as well as work by other Canadian artists. Live theatre can be experienced at the City Playhouse, which also gives local talent a place to perform.

"One hundred years down the road, it's the arts that'll speak about our culture and history to future generations," Levine said. "The time has come for the community of Vaughan to have an arts council."

Another factor motivating Levine is a desire to give back to a community that has so generously embraced his seven-piece Good Vibrations Band.

In recent years, there's been a renewed interest in live music, Levine said, and his world-class party band, whose members are all full-time musicians, plays all styles of music.

"There's been a real resurgence in the band. Bands are coming back in a big way. There's nothing like live music with a dynamic vocalist and seasoned entertainers to really make a party a success," Levine said.

For more information on Levine's arts council initiative, visit www.artsvaughan.com. The Good Vibrations Band can be reached at 905-881-6400 or by going to www.goodvibrationsband.com.

Brighten your decor with colourful balloons or glowing neon

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you're planning your party, don't neglect the décor. Of course, you're going to give major attention to music and food, but décor is almost a synonym for ambience – it's the first thing your guests see when they come in, and first impressions matter.

Most party venues look more cheerful with a splash of bright colour.

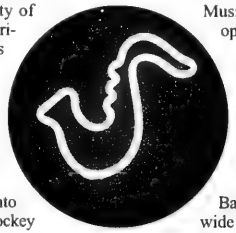
Dean Northcott of The Bending Machine (416-530-2440, www.thebendingmachine.com) specializes in neon centrepieces and name boards, while Elvy Cohen of Balloon Bash (905-707-8177) specializes in colourful balloons.

Both can add a splash of brightness to a room, taking the ambience from just OK to "way fun."

"Balloons appeal to the inner child, the part of us that's always a kid," Cohen says.

The same could be said of the bright, strong colours of neon.

At one time, there were only three or four colours of neon, and while balloons had greater variety of shades, their tones were rather flat. New materials and new ways of making and mixing colours have changed this. In both balloons and neon, today's colours are more varied and vibrant.



The Bending Machine makes neon centrepieces and name boards mainly, though not exclusively, for bar mitzvahs; and besides working independently, Northcott also works through other decor companies.

He works with four-foot neon tubes bent into the shapes of "whatever a kid's into," such as hockey sticks or music notes.

"There are hundreds of colours available," says Northcott.

The neon gas inside each tube is red or blue, to which he adds phosphor powder in a range of shades. He can also colour the outside of the tube itself using translucent paint. Red gas in a red tube, for example, produces a deep ruby red, while red gas in a yellow tube gives you orange.

Northcott does his custom work in his own shop

"For this, I need at least two weeks," he says.

He rents out centrepieces and stock items, but a name board is always a custom order, which clients get to keep.

While Northcott welcomes custom orders, he has 18 popular themes in stock. Musical items include guitars, saxophones and notes.

"My most popular item is blue music notes," he says.

Besides adding a cheerful note to any bar mitzvah, a neon name board makes a lasting memento.

"A properly sealed tube should last forever," Northcott promises.

The choices at Balloon Bash are just as wide and varied.

"Balloon Bash does balloon décor of all kinds, on any theme you want, in any form from simple, old-fashioned balloons to complex sculptures," says Cohen. "I can make you anything from a huge happy face to a life-size motorcycle."

Her balloons are often attached to foam cutout centrepieces. A foam figure of a hockey player might have balloons in team colours, with images of the mascot or team.

Cohen's balloons are also popular at brit milahs and baby namings, where you might find a floating sculpture in the shape of a baby bottle.

And the motorcycle sculpture she mentioned, which contained 1,000 balloons, was for a bar mitzvah.

But balloons are also in demand at grown-up events such as engagement parties, Mother's Day bashes and adult birthdays.

Balloon Bash, top pictures, and The Bending Machine, bottom pictures, have unique ways of decorating your parties.

And giving candy and flowers with balloons adds a note of lightness to the gift.

Balloon Bash also sends balloon-a-grams: bouquets of balloons with printed messages. In one get-well message, a patient received a bouquet of balloons in the shape of bandages.

"The range of colours today is huge," Cohen says. Pearl-toned metallic balloons come in a wide range of colours, and spray-painting makes virtually anything possible.

Interesting effects can also be attained by putting different coloured balloons inside other balloons. Gold inside red, for example, produces a deep red, while red inside gold gives a bright orange.

"We've put coloured balloons inside a big clear one," Cohen says, "And we've even put a teddy bear in a big clear balloon. Gifts inside balloons have a lot of appeal."

Cohen's other major line of work is gift baskets, and she also works with plush.

To keep up with developments, she attends trade shows regularly.

"There's no shortage of new ideas in the field," she smiles.

Richmond Hill Club offers more than a fitness faciltiy

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Emma Young, director of operations at Richmond Hill Country Club (905-731-2800) can't help but brag. Her club has more members than ever – about 2,200 – the catering department already has a number of bookings for 2007 and her staff, she says, are the best in their field.

"One of our martial arts instructors comes from Hollywood. He has his sixth- or seventh-level black belt and has worked with a ton of actors," she says.

The martial arts program, which is entering its fifth year, is just one of many activities the club offers. While it's steadily becoming more popular, nothing beats the club's pride and joy – their tennis program.

"We're a first-class tennis facility," says Young. "We have both hard and soft courts, indoor and outdoor, full seasonal facilities, and we teach tennis courses as well. The tennis instructors are excellent."

With 20 courts in total, tennis lovers won't have to worry about not getting a chance to work on their serve. Even if a racquet breaks, the rally doesn't have to stop. The country club offers a 24-hour stringing service and a pro shop complete with all the tennis accessories Andre Agassi could want.

Besides racquet sports – they also have squash and racquetball courts – the club has a full fitness facility, a par 70 golf course and plenty of activities for the kids.

"No one runs a better youth club than we do. We've run an exceptional youth camp for five years, and we even have youth training programs for tennis," says Young.

While it's Young's job to hype up the club's activities, she does say that some programs aren't for everyone. The club tailors memberships to individuals and, Young says, they never sell their clients something they don't need.

"We don't oversell. We do life planning, so if they need the basic membership, they can get that. If it's a family with kids, we plan accordingly."

With such flexibility, it's not a surprise that people are joining the club. However, Young says it's more than just choice that's attracting new members.

"There are a lot of reasons why people choose country clubs. Travelling is a bit of a risk these days, and at our club, you don't have to make any plans. You go away on vacation and you take your family – here you can host and entertain. We host their guests like this is their home. Here they come, they stay, they pay a food minimum – this is their home away from home. We even have a band and a DJ on weekends. It's more than just coming and leaving."

If coming and leaving is your style though, Young says the club can accommodate that, too. Many people who use the facilities are non-members. While they pay about 20 per cent more than members to use Richmond's services, they're more than welcome to spend a day at the spa or an hour with a tennis pro.

However, at the 20-year-old country club membership has its privileges – many privileges.

"Memberships start at $1,000," says Young. "That's for a basic fitness membership, and it goes up from there. But the more services you use, the bigger the discount. As well, we always give first privilege to members. They will get the best selection times. As well, if you have a child, they would get a half-price membership. Imagine getting your hair done while your kid is taking a tennis lesson."

> Never sells their clients anything they don't need

For those who aren't sure if a country club is for them, the club offers a 30-day money-back guarantee. It's a good deal, but, Young says, hardly anyone takes them up on the offer.

"I've been here for 10 years and maybe that's happened twice, if that. We take great care in spending time with someone to select a membership, and we have put many members into lesser paying memberships the year after. As we change, we want to better personalize each member. Some members have been with us for years and it's important to touch base with them personally – it's important to touch base with all our members."

It's clear Young's confident about her club, but with so many new workout places popping up, could Richmond's days be numbered?

"No way. We don't get concerned when we see other large fitness facilities come up in our area. We add so much more that it's not really the same as a fitness membership," she says.

After talking to Young, it sounds like the Richmond Hill Country Club has every angle and desire covered. However, there is one thing you can't do there – sleep.

"That's all we lack. We don't have beds," she says.

Give your parties the sensuality and freshness of Mint

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Jeff Kahane, creative director of Mint Events (416-923-6468 or 416-923-MINT; website www.mintevents.ca), has a lot of experience in the party industry.

He's always been on a quest for new ideas and approaches to making every client's event unique.

And this is precisely what Mint Events aspires to.

"There's no such thing as a typical Mint Events affair," Kahane says confidently.

"It's you, the client, who gives the special occasion its unique character. Our task is to turn your dreams into reality."

But isn't that what any good event planner does? What gives Mint Events its special flavour?"

The word "mint" in the company's mame, Kahane points out, is a multiple pun.

The mint herb has a scent that is sensually powerful – sharp, yet strikingly fresh and sweet. A newly struck coin, in mint condition, has a bright, cheerful glint. And we speak of minting or coining new ideas.

Mint Events aspires to give your celebration the sensuality and freshness of mint, Kahane says. It should be a memorable occasion, both sensual and spiritual – an experience that's comfortable yet spectacular, and whimsical yet elegant.

First and foremost, Mint Events' designers get to know you, to understand your lifestyle and what matters to you, so that they can give you the best possible experience.

Kahane wants "mint" to become the symbol for living life to the fullest, for living on your own terms, and for letting your inhibitions go.

Of every Mint Event, he wants guests and hosts to say: "That was incredible; who could have thought of it? And yet, it was just so right!"

Kahane calls Mint Events' approach "holistic event planning."

Holistic medicine sets out not just to cure a specific ailment, but to make the whole patient a healthy person.

Similarly, Kahane says, holistic event planning isn't just about a single aspect of an event, such as lighting or music. It's about you, the whole person. This means the event designers have to get to know you well, almost as if you are a friend.

Not that long ago, Kahane says, there were all kinds of social clubs for every kind of fun, from bridge to swimming, but most of these have faded away.

Today, people e-mail or phone each other, and too much human contact has been lost, he believes.

Mint Events wants people to interact in person again, face to face – not just through electronics. They want people to get together for fun, the way they used to. And they want to appeal to older singles, young married couples and young families.

Kahane has been working in the party industry for 15 years, including for Mandell Entertainment since 1995. He and his coworkers aim to take Mint Events far beyond traditional bar mitzvah and DJ companies to create a full-service entertainment network.

Need something for your event? Why not rent?

By JENNIFER THOMPSON
Special to The CJN

A good rental company with professional service and quality products is often exactly what you need to create the perfect event.

Giant Screen Systems in Mississauga, and Around the Table, a specialty linen rental company in Toronto, are two such companies.

Around the Table (416-630-6704) specializes in renting exquisite tablecloths and napkins for your special event.

Owner Debbie Farkas says table linens are the easiest way to achieve a certain look in a room.

Linens can set the tone for the event and are the best possible way to set the décor.

"Gone are the days of the plain white tablecloth," Farkas says.

Table linens are now available in fabrics such as rich velvet, taffeta and quilted linens. Farkas, who carries a large inventory of European table linens, even offers unique organza linen tablecloths with flowers sewn onto them to achieve the look of petals in a flower garden.

When designing the look of your room, Farkas welcomes you to book an appointment, where you will have access to a designer who will help you come up with a plan.

Farkas and her staff have built a solid reputation in the city. She can provide table linens for a wide variety of events ranging from weddings and bar or bat mitzvahs to charity events and corporate meetings. Around the Table will also deliver and pick up all linens from your event.

Once you have achieved the look of your room, renting equipment is another important aspect of your event.

Serving the entire Greater Toronto Area, Giant Screen Systems (416-784-4454) offers a complete line of audiovisual equipment at competitive prices.

Owner Saul Kessen says Giant Screen Systems has the equipment to accommodate meetings and events from 10 to 10,000 people anywhere, and it has a track record of excellence dating back to 1983.

A key factor in the company's success has been repeat business and referrals from satisfied customers. Its client base is large and varied, from private individuals to small businesses to large corporate clients.

Renting from Giant Screen Systems is a hassle-free experience, Kessen says.

The company uses the latest technology and provides clients with high definition and high-resolution equipment. Kessen's staff will deliver and pick up all the equipment for your event. A professional technician will also set up and test the equipment. Clients are given the option to have the technician stay for the duration of the event to operate the equipment. However, if a client prefers to operate it themselves, Kessen's staff will make sure they fully understand how to use it.

It's this commitment to quality and service that's made Giant Screen Systems a leader in the audiovisual industry, Kessen says.

Give your parties the sensuality and freshness of Mint

Mint Events strives to let you immerse yourself in the pleasure of the event, so Kahane and company try not to bother you with technical details unless you want to know them.

They encourage your involvement; but when that's not practical, they assume all responsibilities from conception to final production. They keep track of every detail, managing the caterers, flowers, band, rentals, guest list, favours, champagne, etc.

This means that after getting to know your personality and lifestyle, as well as your ideas and the purpose of your event, Mint's event designers will create concepts, theming and design suggestions to achieve and enhance your objectives.

Besides invitations, menus and name cards, Mint Events' graphic designers can customize a password-protected website for your event where you can view all the details. They can also give your site a guest area, where guests can RSVP, sign a guest book, and get directions and updated information.

Recently, Mint Events planned a pink-themed tea party that took place on a Sunday afternoon at a house in Hollywood Hills. The following delectations were served:

- pink champagne;
- an "afternoon blend" tea from London's Fortnum and Mason department store;
- mini currant scones served with clotted cream and a selection of jams and lemon curd, also from F & M;
- tea sandwiches filled with smoked salmon, dill and lemon zest;
- miniature lemon and strawberry tarts,
- and chocolate eclairs.

And this was just a tea party.

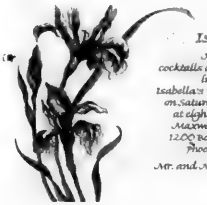
A well-designed invitation conveys a party's mood

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The invitation for a simchah is the first step in evoking some excitement for the big day.

A well-designed invitation will convey the mood of the upcoming party, says Arthur Talkins of Creative Invitation (416-736-4723, www.creativeinvitations.ca), a full-service invitation company.

Talkins, who's been in the general printing business since moving to Canada from South Africa in 1987, has gone back to his roots in printing – creating invitations. He recently launched Creative Invitations, a new division of his full-service printing business.



"We've created a different kind of invitation – a shell or blank card with a foiled and embossed border," he says.

The shells give the client the option to do their own printing, but Talkins stresses that Creative Invitations can do all the printing. "We offer the printing service or the empty shell so the client can print it themselves if they wish.

"It's a gorgeous shell with a beautiful border. The foiled and embossed cards are a sophisticated and elegant look, and we offer it at a very competitive price."

For now, the company is concentrating on three colours – gold, silver and lilac, he adds. "We can also do any pigment foil, but it's more customized and therefore more expensive."

Indeed, complete customized invitations with monograms and names are available, he says. "We sit down and we can work together to create something very personalized and original.

"Once you have a complete printing service, you can offer anything. We can even print pictures. We offer something for every budget."

Talkins says Creative Invitations has packages that include invitations, reply cards, thank-you notes and table cards. "The embossed and foil card is great for a wedding or an elegant bar mitzvah.

"It also has a corporate application as an announcement. I recently got a call for a golf day."

Aimee Berman also offers personalized invitation service through her home-based company, Pro-Art Invitations (905-763-1644).

Berman started the company eight years ago on the advice of her own bridal consultant. "She recommended that I start the business when I met her, after I told her my family was in the printing business… I worked there for almost 15 years," Berman says.

"'You have the background in printing,' she told me. "You should be selling invitations."

Berman started the invitation business and continued working for her family until her first child was born. "When I had kids, I moved the invitation business to the house," she says.

She has a five-year-old daughter and three-year-old son.

She says the home environment gives her the flexibility to work outside regular business hours, which is advantageous for clients with serious work commitments. "I see clients evenings and weekends."

Berman does the full gamut of invitations, from weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs to sweet sixteens, baby namings, anniversaries and birthdays. "I also do a lot of personalized stationery and holiday cards," she says.

Wedding packages may also include a wedding program and a henna-party invitation, she adds. "I recently did bookmarks for guests to read along with the siddur for a bat mitzvah. It became a giveaway, something the guests could keep."

Clients like Pro-Art Invitation's extensive selection, Berman says. "Because we had a company in the U.S. and Canada, I can offer domestic and imported invitations. Canadian has a shorter delivery time, but with the current U.S. exchange rate, some of the U.S. products are better priced."

Berman says that for wedding invitations, the use of ribbons as a decorative feature is more common than bows.

Another popular trend is the French-flap envelope, "a long skinny envelope with a rectangular flap. It's custom-made and can be more costly," she notes.

Textured papers with a linen finish and rice paper are popular for weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs. "There's also a lot of layering, which can become expensive," she says.

"I help clients stay within their budget. For example, they may be able to do two layers instead of three."

Berman says her clients' budgets and preferences vary. "Some people prefer simple and elegant. Some get extravagant for a different budget."

There are ways of keeping within a budget, she notes. "You can use one envelope instead of a double-lined one or different ink… I work closely with the clients to understand their needs."

Berman encourages the bridal party to take home a few samples and discuss the invitation with family members. "It works more smoothly," she says.

She has followed her clients through several life-cycle events. "Many of the people I did wedding invitations for I'm now doing their baby invitations. It's nice to see the clients come back and see the changes they go through from the wedding to the baby naming. The next thing it will be a bar mitzvah," she says.

Retailers make shopping for boyswear easy

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Paul Spiar says Crawford's promises to be a pleasurable experience.

When your son is at that age where everything seems to be going wrong and right at the same time, the last thing you need is another hectic shopping trip.

But those all-too-familiar experiences of shopping without help, or not finding a single thing that fits, will be things of the past with these two retailers – Crawford Boys and Le Club. They promise to show you and your son that successful shopping is just as easy as 1-2-3.

Crawford Boys (416-782-8137) specializes in boyswear for those ages six to 15 and is unique in its dedication to boyswear. "We originally started with a small boys' section that just kept getting bigger and bigger, until we realized that this was a new niche that no one else catered to," says Paul Spiar, Crawford's owner.

> Your son will leave the store as happy as you are

A second-generation family-owned business, Crawford's began in 1952, when Spiar's father opened a menswear store in the downtown area. In the Lawrence Plaza since 1989, the store offers everything from formal suits to casual wear in all the shapes, sizes and colours you can imagine. Crawford Boys' selection is so vast that entire walls are devoted to shirts and ties. Since its specializes only in boyswear, Crawford's also carries husky sizes that can accommodate those young men that seem to mature earlier than the rest.

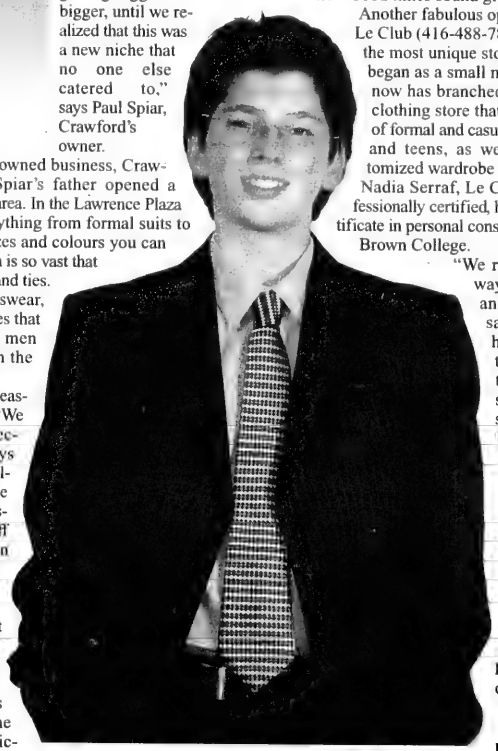
Crawford's promises to be a pleasurable experience for everyone. "We really go above and beyond expectations to please our clients," says Spiar. "We have an extremely talented staff who understands the fundamentals of caring for our customers." As well, the Crawford staff makes sure to involve everyone in the decisions being made. "We don't talk over the boys – they are involved, too."

One of the great things about Crawford's is its fun and exciting environment.

Along with its great selection of clothing, the store features hockey memorabilia galore. The walls are covered with signed pictures of players, and Spiar has a collection of more than 100,000 hockey cards, most of which are free for the boys to take home with them. Spiar even has retired NHL players come into the store and sign autographs once a year. As if that wasn't enough, the store has basketball hoops and a pinball machine. "We make it fun for the kids, and that way they like coming here and shopping isn't so hard," says Spiar.

This year for boys, what's hot is pink, pink and more pink. "Bright stripes are also extremely popular," says Spiar. To make these trends look best, the store offers custom tailoring, and alterations on regularly priced merchandise are free.

Crawford Boys has it all – great clothes, fabulous selection and a whole lotta fun. "It's so much fun to sell to a younger group," says Spiar. "We can relax and have a good time." Good times sound great to me.



Le Club has become one of the premier destinations for events and special occasions such as bar mitzvahs.

Another fabulous option for boyswear is Le Club (416-488-7848), possibly one of the most unique stores in the city. What began as a small menswear endeavour, now has branched into a full- service clothing store that sells a wide variety of formal and casual wear for men, boys and teens, as well as offering customized wardrobe consultation. In fact, Nadia Serraf, Le Club's owner, is professionally certified, having received a certificate in personal consultation from George Brown College.

"We really go out of our way to create a unique and personal image," says Serraf. Le Club has become one of the premier destinations for events and special occasions such as weddings and bar mitzvahs. "We'll dress all the men in the family to co-ordinate perfectly," says Serraf. Le Club will even customize ties and accessories to match the image they want.

Le Club caters to young professionals who want to look their best for the corporate world as well as boys and teens looking for the perfect looks for bar mitzvahs, proms and graduations. With the help of their excellent listening skills, the staff at Le Club can make these looks into a reality. "They like to play around to make the outfits the best they can be," says Serraf.

Right now, slender suits, lavender and lots of stripes are hot trends at Le Club. What makes these outfits look so great? "Well, everything always looks good with black," Serraf says, laughing.

"It's so gratifying for us to make the customer happy. They are always so thankful and appreciative."

With Crawford and Le Club around, you don't have to worry about the daunting task of shopping with your ever-changing young man. These stores are geared especially toward fitting boys. Your son will never feel patronized, or left out, and will leave the store as happy as you are. Maybe he'll even stop wearing those jeans below his bum.

New committee aims to engage Jewish community in electoral process

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Just in time for the federal election, a new organization is being launched this week to engage politically motivated Jews in the electoral process.

CJPAC, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, is intended to "advance issues of concern to the Canadian Jewish community by encouraging participation directly in the political process," states a CJPAC news release.

The new organization's name bears a possibly confusing resemblance to that of CIJA-PAC, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy Public Affairs Committee. The latter is a national membership-based lobbying organization that represents the Canadian Jewish community's interests to politicians and other opinion leaders and decision makers.

Josh Cooper, executive director of CJPAC, said the two organizations are distinct. CJPAC is a "multipartisan" organization that encourages and assists individuals to join the political process and by virtue of their involvement, over the course of time influence the parties' policies in a direction favourable to the Jewish community, including one more supportive of Israel.

Cooper said CJPAC is funded by donations and "is financially independent of all current Jewish organizations." Because it is involved in political activities, no tax receipts are issued for contributions.

Israeli 'bachelor' chooses Canadian

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — When Torontonian Miriam Anbar arrived in Tel Aviv last July, fame was the last thing on her mind.

Anbar, 21, came to Israel as an exchange student from York University to continue her studies in political science at Tel Aviv University (TAU). Little did she know that by the end of second semester, she would become Israel's hottest reality TV star.

Anbar was Ari Goldman's final choice on the recently concluded "Bachelor" equivalent in Israel, Mikol Habanot B'olam (Of All the Girls in the World). Israel's reality TV mogul Elad Kuperman is the executive producer

The 12-episode show, which aired on the HOT cable network, saw Goldman, 35, a successful entrepreneur and certified Jewish Prince Charming from New York, choose Anbar from among 18 Jewish girls from around the world who tried out to be his Jewish Cinderella.

"At first, I had no idea what I was getting into," says Anbar, who adds that a scout from Kuperman Productions had approached her best friend from Toronto, who was also on exchange at Tel Aviv University, and who recommended Anbar try out for the part, instead.

"I went into it with an open mind," says Anbar, who was born and raised by her Israeli-born parents in Thornhill, where she went to Associated Hebrew Schools, then later to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. "But I never expected to get as far as I did."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rabbi Meets Pettigrew

OTTAWA — Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, held talks here last week with Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew. Rabbi Cooper briefed Pettigrew on the rabbi's recent meeting with Pope Benedict XVI, and he urged Canada to regard suicide bombings as crimes against humanity – not as amendments to the Criminal Code, but as a statement of principle. Rabbi Cooper also took part in a press conference denouncing recent Christian campaigns to divest from Israel, including last month's divestment conference held in Toronto that was sponsored by the pro-Palestinian Sabeel Center in Jerusalem.

Manor To Return?

TORONTO — Boaz Manor, the Israeli co-founder of failed Canadians hedge fund Portus Alternative Management, will return to Canada to fight the Ontario Securities Commission charges against him, his lawyer told the Globe and Mail this month. Manor, who fled to Israel after Portus was forced into receivership last March, had said he's mentally ill and can't answer questions from KPMG, Portus' receiver, about $800 million in missing assets. The OSC has laid three charges each against Manor and Portus co-founder Michael Mendelson, saying they destroyed documents and improperly sold Portus products to investors. Mendelson is reportedly negotiating a deal with the OSC.

Decision Reserved

OTTAWA — A Federal Court judge last week reserved judgment on a motion by government lawyers to throw out a lawsuit against Ottawa by Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel. Zundel launched a $10-million suit in early November against the federal government, claiming the two years he spent in jail under a security certificate was unconstitutional. Zundel was removed to Germany in March and charged there with inciting racial hatred. His trial there was postponed last month when the judge fired his defence team for including a far-right figure.

Pollard Flays Israel

JERUSALEM — Jonathan Pollard lashed out at Israel last week, accusing its government of not doing more to win his release from jail. "The political establishment is really a mafia, a collective mafia, and they take care of their own," Pollard, a former U.S. Navy analyst serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, said in an interview broadcast on Israeli TV last week. Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz "has knowingly abandoned a soldier in the field," Pollard said. "He isn't fit to wear the uniform." Last week, hundreds of Israelis formed a human chain between the prime minister's residence and the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem to mark 20 years since Pollard's arrest.

You Know He's Bad!

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League said Michael Jackson has an "anti-Semitic streak" after he called Jews "leeches" in a voicemail message to his former agent. In tapes aired last week on ABC's Good Morning America program, the singer says Jews "suck" and that "it is a conspiracy. The Jews do it on purpose." The ADL blasted the remarks. "Michael Jackson has an anti-Semitic streak, and hasn't learned from his past mistakes," said ADL national director Abraham Foxman. "It seems every time he has a problem in his life, he blames it on the Jews." In 1995, Jackson removed anti-Semitic lyrics from his song They Don't Care About Us.

Arab Group Lashes PM For Israel Remarks

OTTAWA — The Canadian Arab Federation (CAF) rebuked Prime Minister Paul Martin last week for telling delegates to the recent United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto that "Israel's values are Canada's values."

"Canada does not share common values with some countries, like Israel, who break international law and whose human rights record is clearly questionable," the CAF's acting president Faraj Nakhleh told a CA reception in Ottawa attended by the leaders of the four major federal parties.

Nakhleh said Canada's support for the United Nations goes against what he said has been Israel's failure to abide by numerous UN resolutions, Canadian Press reported.

"UN resolutions are not a buffet where we can pick and choose as we like. Why aren't UN resolutions regarding the Palestinian-Israeli issue implemented?" Nakhleh said.

Speaking after Nakhleh, Martin urged Canadian businesses to increase trade with the Arab world. "Canada is a friend to the Arab world, Canada is a friend to Israel," he said. "At times we will speak frankly to either side. Our ultimate goal is the goal that I believe everyone holds, and that is for peace in the Middle East."

Martin told the GA last month that Israel and Canada share "values of democracy, the rule of law and the protection of human rights."

Senators spar over Mideast policy

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A Canadian senator has all but accused federal Justice Minister and Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler of running the country's Middle East policy.

Marcel Prud'homme, a longtime anti-Israel gadfly, rose in the Senate last week to ask "whether it is true that the real minister of foreign affairs pertaining to the Middle East, who is vetting every word of every resolution, is not the minister of foreign affairs, Mr. Pierre Pettigrew, but the honourable member from Mont Royal."

Prud'homme, an independent from Quebec appointed to the upper chamber in 1993, wondered whether Cotler, the Jewish member for the Montreal-area riding, "is responsible in cabinet for vetting every word, comma and paragraph of anything pertaining to the Middle East."

Prud'homme's explosive query began as a tirade against Canada's votes at a United Nations committee that considered nine Arab-sponsored resolutions condemning Israel.

On Nov. 14, Canada voted against Israel seven times, abstained once, and supported Israel once. That was the day after Prime Minister Paul Martin delivered ringing support for Israel at the United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Toronto.

But Prud'homme chided Canada for its one vote supporting Israel.

"To the embarrassment of many, Canada voted with the Federated States of Micronesia, Marshall Islands, Nauru, Palau, Tuvalu, United States, and Israel," he said.

"In case there is doubt, you vote in good company," Prud'homme continued. "This time, good company abstained from voting. Everyone abstained. Canada is the only country that put its neck out with these great new allies of Marshall Islands, Nauru, Palau, Tuvalu and Micronesia.

"Why were we voting in that manner at the United Nations? Are there any developments I am unaware of, so I can visit these new allies of Canada and ask them what is going on?"

If Cotler is vetting Canada's Mideast policy, "it is disturbing to know that the minister of foreign affairs has been eliminated."

At that point, Senator Jack Austin, leader of the government in the Senate, explained that Canada's UN votes on the Middle East are "based on an attempt to be constructive... We find [the resolutions] lack fairness and balance, so we try to encourage a more innovative approach to drafting these resolutions than has been the case in the past."

Austin said it's "no secret" that UN resolutions on Israel and the Palestinian question "have been quite polemical and are designed for political positioning rather than based on the merits of issues.

"Canada seeks to have these resolutions based on a pragmatic and reality-driven formula, which allows the parties to enhance the possibility of their dialogue."

Austin said Canada follows a policy of "offering both criticism and support of Palestinian and Israeli practices or their failures to live up to their obligations, and we are consistently strong in condemning acts of terrorism."

Recently appointed Liberal Senator Yoine Goldstein of Montreal replied that Pettigrew would be "particularly disturbed and upset" if he found out that Cotler was setting Canadian foreign policy.

Goldstein asked whether Ottawa follows the policy enunciated by Martin on several occasions that Canada is a friend and ally of Israel.

"Does the government of Canada accept the assertion by [Martin] that Canada and Israel share common values? That is what the prime minister said. Is that the policy that is followed by us in the United Nations and elsewhere?"

Austin replied that what Martin said about Canada's relationship with Israel or the Palestinians "is the policy of Canada."

Goldstein told The CJN that Prud'homme's questions about Cotler should not be taken seriously because they are "manifestly ridiculous."

"At least by now he should recognize that he can no longer spout this sort of thing with impunity."

USDS HAS BEEN WELCOMING FAMILIES LIKE YOURS FOR OVER 40 YEARS

United Synagogue Day School has been proudly and successfully educating Toronto area students for over 40 years. In recent years, the role of Jewish day school education has transformed, requiring schools to respond to these changing needs.

Over the past few months, the USDS Board of Directors has been faced with the challenge of restructuring the school's facilities, to ensure the ongoing success of the school and to continue to meet the needs of the GTA's Jewish community. These changes include:

the transition of our Richmond Hill campus to our Bayview location in September 2006

the development of our new campus in Vaughan for September 2008

renovating facilities at our Bathurst location

the introduction of new programs at our Bayview campus, including a differentiated Jewish studies program and a Nursery program for September 2006

USDS remains a leader in education; the diversity of programming, the nurturing environment and the Conservative Jewish values that are the cornerstones of our achievements have not changed, nor will they.

The personal success of over 40 years of USDS graduates speaks volumes to the USDS quality of education, and we look forward to welcoming your family to the USDS community for generations to come.

A man of constant hope

From the editor's desk

History will record that the unilateral disengagement by Israel from the Gaza Strip last summer was a watershed moment in the life of the young state. Three months after the fact, it is still far too early to know in which direction the currents of sovereign Jewish life are flowing as a result of that decision. We are still in disengagement's aftermath and will be so for a long period still. Moreover, the decisions and actions of the Palestinians and their supporters too will have a significant influence upon the eventual consequences of the disengagement.

But one thing we do know for certain is that the internal Israeli civil strife that was feared and predicted by some people prior to the disengagement did not materialize. The vast majority of the evacuees did not allow it. And the comportment of the soldiers and the police was simply too honourable and too humane to have ignited it.

Prof. Moshe Kaveh, the president of Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan, considers the way the disengagement was executed to have been a vindication for Israel's democratic institutions. "We should be proud that democracy triumphed," he told The CJN recently.

Kaveh was in Toronto to attend the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities recently. We met at offices of The CJN for coffee and conversation that ultimately ranged across fields of theology, biblical exegesis, civics, Jewish history, philosophy and science. He spoke emotionally about the need for Israel to be both Jewish and democratic. It is of uncompromising importance for him. The physicist-professor-president has very firm ideas about the co-mingling of religious authority and governmental authority. They shouldn't.

"The country is still developing and we have not yet prepared the Halachot to fashion both a Jewish and democratic state, in the fullest sense of democracy that encompasses people from different backgrounds and all walks of life.

"It is not appropriate for rabbis to offer religious rulings on questions of borders and of security."

Kaveh, the leader of the university that carries the banner in Israel of modern religious Zionism and attempts, in its ethos and curricula, to meld Jewish values with accepted international norms of academia, took a bold step last summer by courageously, publicly and very strongly speaking out against what he termed "the extremist rabbis" who directed soldiers to disobey their disengagement orders. In interviews with the Jerusalem Post, Ha'aretz and in an article he wrote for Yediot Achronot, the president of the Israel's largest university unambiguously urged soldiers to ignore the directives of the rabbis who counselled disobedience.

Moshe Kaveh

"Directing soldiers to refuse orders is absolutely wrong. I said so. And I said so with a great deal of pain in my heart. But once a decision is taken by the government of Israel, it must be executed by the military establishment.

"For 2,000 years, we prayed for a state… God forbid that we should destroy it by destroying the authority that must reside with the government."

Kaveh praised the army in superlative terms. In his mind, the soldiers who walked hand in hand with the Gaza evacuees despite personal reservations and doubts were "real heroes."

But he still worried about divisions within society. The impassioned and sometimes inflammatory nature of the pre-disengagement rhetoric by even a small cadre of vocal opponents, suggested to Kaveh that "religious Zionism is in a crisis."

"But as with all crises," the animated professor continued, "it cannot be resolved in one day. It will take time. And Bar-Ilan will be involved in the effort to find solutions.

"We need to educate and foster rabbis who are also maskilim (enlightened), who understand the many complicated aspects of living in a modern, democratic society."

As a result, the university has recently opened the Machon Gavoah L'Torah (Higher Institute for Torah). It will attempt to foster a new cadre of rabbanim. It will combine the traditional smichah with a doctorate in another discipline. The graduates (of which there are already two) will be able to respond to the realities of living in the modern state of Israel. They must be the best in Jewish law. But that is no longer enough. It is also vital to understand the basic, compelling issues of modern life. This is a priority for us."

The university has also recently founded the Institute for Judaism and Democracy, whose purpose is to help inspire policies within the reality of modern Israeli life and political processes that can be more reconciled to Jewish values. In fact, Kaveh announced that the university will be hosting a conference this summer under the auspices of President Moshe Katsav that will deal with the question of democracy in Israel and the role in helping fashion that democracy for Jews living outside of Israel.

"We must understand the many differences within Israeli society and try to foster unity though not uniformity. The two qualities are quite distinct."

Kaveh, the professor explained to me, is a form of the word for hope. "Hope is an endless process. We must constantly strive to make the reality of our lives the very best we can. And we can turn to our sources for guidance because Jewish wisdom is a large supermarket of ideas, a beautiful selection of ideas, from which we can build an equally beautiful society."

Reform to invite affiliated non-Jews to convert

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Reform movement in Canada will be following up on an initiative aimed at actively inviting non-Jews to convert to Judaism and on another that will address issues relating to teen sexuality, according to the executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ)

"We will follow up with our congregations," confirmed Rabbi Sharon Sobel, when asked about the conversion initiative announced by Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism at the Reform movement's recent 68th biennial in Houston.

"We've seen a drop in the number of people attending conversion classes," she said. "We know there are a number of non-Jews leading Jewish lives...so it's not proselytizing. We're not seeking people who are not connected to the Jewish faith."

A likely candidate to be invited to convert could be someone with a Jewish spouse, who belongs to a congregation, attends synagogue on a regular basis, celebrates Jewish holidays, is raising a Jewish family, and is not participating in any other faith traditions, Rabbi Sobel said.

Although the greater Toronto area likely doesn't have as high an intermarriage rate as less Jewishly populated centres, she noted, the situation is not unique to the United States.

Yoffie's conversion initiative met with only a smattering of applause from the 3,000 attendees at Saturday morning services Nov. 19, in contrast to the loud approval that greeted his call for honouring non-Jewish parents raising Jewish children, his plea that Reform religious schools not accept students who are also being educated in another faith, and his criticism of the religious right.

Afterward, however, people seemed to agree with Yoffie's approach.

Balancing openness to the intermarried while encouraging conversion is a major challenge for Reform congregation, movement leaders agreed.

A concurrent initiative, said Rabbi Sobel, is to recognize non-Jewish spouses "who have made a Jewish commitment but have chosen not to convert, [and] to offer them the support they need to support their Jewish family, and not to denigrate them for their choice not to convert."

Another of Rabbi Yoffie's initiatives involves promoting lifelong synagogue membership. "The most serious challenge facing North American Jewry today is the low rate of synagogue affiliation," he wrote on a website devoted to the topic.

More than 4,200 Reform Jews from 504 congregations in nine countries, most from the United States, attended the four-day convention at the George R. Brown Convention enter, which recently sheltered Gulf Coast evacuees from Hurricane Katrina.

Hurricane relief, aid to Darfur refugees and opposition to the Iraq war were other major topics at the conference.

Jesse Paikin, a 22-year-old York University student who works part-time for ARZA Canada, the Association of Reform Zionists of Canada, and is a lay leader of Kesher, the Reform movement's college arm, said that some of the students worked on building prefabricated houses, to be shipped to Louisiana for hurricane victims.

As a result of feedback from a workshop he led on building Israel advocacy strategies and his suggestion that education needs to begin before students arrive on campus, he will be working on putting together a curriculum for teens in conjunction with ARZA.

Canadian delegates to the convention included more than 70 adults and seven students. Unlike the United States, where Reform has 900 synagogues and is the country's largest Jewish stream, Canada has a more modest percentage of Reform Jews, with 26 congregations and a reported 10,008 households that are Reform-affiliated.

"Sacred Choices," the teen sexuality initiative, aimed at teens, educators and camp directors in a context of Jewish values, is "a huge issue," said Rabbi Sobel. "We have an obligation to talk about it... and as Jewish educators we have an obligation to our kids to give them those tools to say no and to set limits."

Initiatives announced at the biennial, as a rule, "define a set of directions and reflect on current issues and what the response should be," said Elliott Jacobson, president of the CCRJ.

Baycrest Centre changes its name – to Baycrest

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care last week formally adopted the name it's commonly known by in the Jewish and wider communities, announcing that from now on it will be known simply as "Baycrest."

In addition to the name change, the world-renowned health care and research facility for aging adults also unveiled a new logo and four new "sub-brands" in order to highlight the Bathurst Street institution's work in research, education and out-patient care.

Baycrest
Enriching Care . Enhancing Knowledge Enlightening Minds

"We have outgrown our old name and evolved into much more than a home for the aged and hospital," said Stephen Herbert, Baycrest's president and CEO. "The new identity more accurately reflects the tremendous scope of work Baycrest is doing for aging adults at home and at a distance.'

Today, Baycrest conducts research that makes world headlines; educational outreach professionally and in the community; and services from health promotion in the community to out-patient rehabilitation, long-term care and acute care.

Baycrest has also adopted a new slogan, "Enriching Care, Enhancing Knowledge, Enlightening Minds," and what it calls four new "sub-brands," or "pillars": Baycrest Geriatric Health Care System; Baycrest Research Centre for Aging and the Brain; Baycrest Centre for Education on Aging; and Baycrest Foundation.

Since its founding in 1918 as the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home, Baycrest has evolved over eight decades into an internationally renowned academic health sciences centre with 1,700 full and part-time staff, and 6,000 volunteers.

In 2004, Baycrest opened the Brain Health Centre Clinics to diagnose and treat aging adults with memory, mood and stroke-related cognitive disorders. The clinics are uniquely structured so that neuroscientists work alongside clinicians to monitor the progress of treatment and how the brain is responding or changing.

WHAT MAKES A GREAT SCHOOL GREAT?
great vision

I believe this is the dawn of a new era at Associated and I invite you and your children to be part of it.
Guided by a new cadre of highly qualified educational leaders, Associated is on an exciting path that will truly distinguish it amongst Jewish day schools. We are creating an educational program that is rich in scholarship and fundamentals and, at the same time, provides educational experiences that encourage critical thinking, independent thought and foster a love of learning. We are invoking educational strategies that recognize and realize the unique potential of each child. Our students are learning and living Torah and Zionist values in an environment that is teeming with the spirit of Klal Yisrael.
Grounded by almost a century of success, our eyes are fixed clearly on the future and we will accept no substitute for excellence. The results of our efforts will be a generation of inspired and very capable Jewish young people who are fully prepared to meet the challenges of the 21st century."

Iraq war linked with fight against anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The ceaseless battle against anti-Semitism has been linked with the current allied struggle to bring democracy to Iraq.

In a recent speech marking the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Nazi concentration camps in Europe, British author, journalist and former parliamentarian Winston S. Churchill, the grandson of the iconic wartime prime minister, warned that determination and endurance will be needed to counter anti-Semitism and the insurgency in Iraq.

"On both fronts, let us fight the good fight," said Churchill, delivering the keynote address at The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's annual dinner, held at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

But no one should expect quick and easy solutions on either front, he suggested.

Citing czarist Russian pogroms and the Holocaust, Churchill – a Conservative party member of parliament from 1970 until 1997 – said that no group has historically suffered as much as the Jewish people.

Tony and Elizabeth Comper

Describing anti-Semitism as an "ugly cancer," Churchill said that it can best be fought by non-Jews such as dinner honorees Elizabeth and Tony Comper, the founders of FAST.

FAST, an acronym for Fighting Anti-Semitism Together, was formed last spring. It is a coalition of non-Jewish business and community leaders dedicated to combating anti-Jewish animus in Canada.

The Compers are governors of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. He is president and chief executive officer of BMO Financial Group, a major Canadian banking institution. She is a fundraiser, volunteer and former English teacher.

Churchill, who was born in 1940 when his grandfather was Britain's prime minister and German aircraft were bombing London, began with the pointed observation that this is not a kinder, more tolerant era.

Winston S. Churchill

He cited the massacre of Tutsis in Rwanda and the mass murder of Muslims in Bosnia in the 1990s and, more recently, the slaughter of Christians in Sudan and Pakistan.

In a blunt warning, he said that the newest challenge facing the West today comes from extremist Islam, which has declared a global jihad and has already launched terrorist attacks in, among other places, Madrid, Bali and London.

He said the West desperately needs the help of moderate Muslims to cope with this threat.

Churchill noted that his grandfather was the first to warn of the dangers of radical Islam, when, in a 1921 House of Commons speech, he spoke of Wahhabism in the Arabian peninsula.

Wahhabists have exported their austere, intolerant brand of Islam to virtually every corner of the globe, and the "weak and supine" ruling House of Saud in Saudi Arabia has turned a blind eye to their activities, he charged.

Issuing an implicit criticism of Turkey's application for admission to the European Union, he said that Turkish membership would vastly increase the EU's Muslim population to 100 million.

Turning his attention to Iraq, Churchill said that nothing could be more disastrous if the United States, along with its ally Britain, adopted a defeatist and cowardly "cut-and-run" policy.

The West will pay "a terrible price" should it withdraw from Iraq before the insurgents are beaten back and democracy takes root, he declared.

In a rebuke of the United States, Churchill said that when nations go to war they should expect grievous losses. He compared the 2,000 casualties the United States has sustained in Iraq so far with the 55,000 British soldiers who were killed in a single day in the Battle of the Somme during World War I.

"Is the U.S. going soft? I pray not."

Washington should aim at attaining victory in Iraq at all costs, he observed, reading several lines from one of his grandfather's stirring wartime speeches.

Election imperative

As of this writing, the day of the scheduled non-confidence vote in the House of Commons, the federal parties are poised to bring down the government of Paul Martin. But in truth, the election campaign has already begun.

The government has been on a funding-announcement-a-day schedule for the past many days. And opposition critics have responded by hurling their predictable, over-the-top, overstated asperities at the funding announcers. Pundits and commentators have warned us already that the upcoming campaign will likely be a cold, heartless winter stage for nastiness and name-calling.

We, the voters, have all been here before – if not in the winter. The view is dark and the smell foul. And most of us don't like it. Issues, not individuals, must be debated. Ideas, not insults, must be exchanged. Parties must offer voters something positive to embrace, not something negative to reject.

In addition to the many profound substantive public policy matters at stake in the outcome of the election – health, education, social, welfare, legal, constitutional, economic, industrial, science and foreign affairs, to name but a few – there is also the vital question of the very relevance of the political process to an entire generation of Canadians.

The level of cynicism among all Canadians towards politicians of all party stripes is disheartening and unhealthy. But the sense of alienation from politics among younger Canadians is alarming. To some extent, the way our politicians engage each other – that is, often churlishly, with meanness in their heart and contempt in their language – turns younger Canadians away from the process. That is why the vile campaign rhetoric, if not the tactics, at least must change.

Last week, CJN columnist Sandie Benitah essentially pleaded with the federal parties to reach out and speak directly to the youth of the country.

"Don't give us somebody who just looks like they could be one of us," she wrote. "Give us somebody who can turn the issues surrounding international and domestic policies and make them relevant to the stage we are at in our lives."

"Don't you see? We want to listen. We need someone to talk to us," she urged.

In last Friday's Globe and Mail, pollster Michael Adams, echoed a variation of Benitah's words. He warned our federal politicians, and indeed all Canadians, of the growing support for the separatist cause in Quebec. His warning was aimed at winning the hearts of young Quebecers specifically. But the question he posed was also aimed at all young Canadians. "What does Canada offer young people who aspire not to be politicians in Ottawa or bankers in Toronto or foot soldiers in the American empire, but who merely want to be cool in Quebec?"

The upcoming federal election campaign is an appropriate opportunity for the three federalist parties to actually tell young people what their vision of Canada offers them.

Canada must do better at UN

The time is now for Canada to continue building on our work to curb the steady flow of one-sided resolutions that persistently chastise and unfairly criticize Israel at the United Nations.

In light of Prime Minister Paul Martin's heartening speech at the General Assembly of the United Jewish Communities, in which he stated his support for the State of Israel and said that Canada and Israel share the values of democracy and the rule of law, I was disappointed by Canada's recent votes at a UN committee ("Martin links Canadian, Israeli values," CJN, Nov. 17).

There was a modest shift in Canada's UN voting record vis-à-vis Israel last year, and the Canadian ambassador to the UN, Allan Rock, said he would move to stem these one-sided and unhelpful resolutions.

I believe our actions should reflect our words.

By supporting one-sided resolutions, we are clearly undermining our goal and isolating Israel at the world body. In the coming weeks, two more resolutions will be brought before the General Assembly of the United Nations, and I am continuing to actively press for change. To be honest brokers and to take a leadership role in the Middle East conflict, Canada needs to offer a balanced approach in our voting at the UN.

While I acknowledge that the Canadian delegation to the UN has made some progress, we must still do better. As such, I am calling on the Canadian delegation to vote against the two resolutions when they are up for a vote at the GA this month. The bottom line is that we cannot be the honest broker and support dishonest resolutions.

Sharon brave to leave Likud

Five years ago, I wrote a letter to The CJN condemning Ariel Sharon, then the leader of the opposition Likud party. He had visited the Temple Mount at a sensitive time and as a concerned Jew and son of an Israeli, I felt strongly that it was simply not the time for an Israeli leader to be asserting his sovereignty, no matter how much I believed it was his right to do so. Shortly thereafter, [the late Palestinian Authority President Yasser] Arafat manipulated the world into believing that the second intifadah was a popular reaction to Sharon's visit.

I am writing today to share my honest and absolute pride in Sharon, in his steadfast dedication to Israel's security, and his clear quest for a peaceful solution to the conflict – without compromising Israel's security. His decision to leave the Likud was a brave and earth-shattering move that will tell the world and hopefully Israel's neighbours that the democratic State of Israel, and the Jewish world as a whole, chooses peace. ("Sharon quits Likud," CJN, Nov. 24).

I mourned in Israel 10 years ago when former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was taken from us. By leaving Likud, Sharon became the first Israeli leader to give me an ounce of hope that Rabin's work was not in vain. Arik, we are with you.

Says Parizeau's first wife not Jewish

I read with interest the guest column "Parizeau's Jewish connection" (CJN, Nov. 10).

As a member of the leadership of the Montreal Jewish community, I had occasion to meet Jacques Parizeau several times, including having private, one-on-one discussions with him. In one of these sessions, he told me that his first wife, Alice, indeed did have a concentration camp number on her left arm, but that she was not Jewish. She had, he said, participated in the Warsaw uprising against the Germans when the Russian army was on the eastern shores of the Vistula. Like many in the Polish resistance, she was captured by the Germans and sent to a concentration camp.

Seeking Jews who have lived in China

I am a former volunteer of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee. I now work for a major Chinese newspaper in Toronto. I have long been an avid researcher on Sino-Judaic history. I would like to locate elderly Jews who have lived in China. As this will be one of the rare years when Chanukah falls during the Christmas period, I would very much like to do an article on the history of Jews in China for our Christmas special.

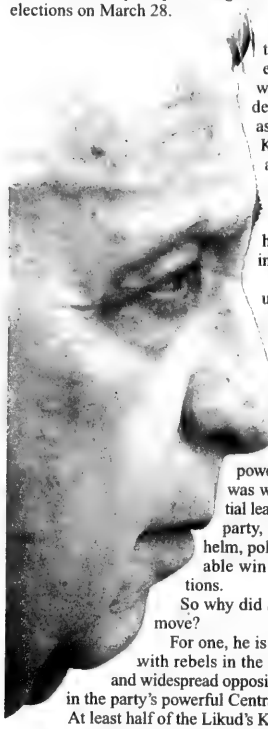
Sharon's political earthquake

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Ariel Sharon's dramatic break with the ruling Likud Party is expected to have implications far beyond Israeli politics. Sharon's move last week to form a new centrist party, dubbed Kadima (Forward), will undoubtedly change the Israeli political landscape – but seasoned politicians say the prime minister would not have embarked on such a risky political adventure unless he plans major peace moves with the Palestinians that he knows wouldn't be acceptable to the Likud.

Though Sharon denies it, some pundits say he is aiming to create a new political constellation in which he can withdraw Israeli forces from most of the West Bank and set a new, long-term border with the Palestinians.

The move leaves the Likud in disarray, looking for a new leader and with polls predicting a resounding defeat in early elections on March 28.



Sharon set in motion the process leading to early elections last week when he called on President Moshe Katsav and asked him to dissolve the Knesset. Sharon then sent a letter to Tzachi Hanegbi, chairman of the Likud Central Committee, informing him that he was resigning from the party.

The two moves added up to a political earthquake: early elections in March, with the prime minister running for re-election at the head of a new party.

Few doubt that Sharon easily could have returned to power on a Likud ticket. He was well ahead of his potential leadership rivals within the party, and with Sharon at the helm, polls predicted a comfortable win for Likud in the elections.

So why did Sharon make his risky move?

For one, he is tired of having to deal with rebels in the Likud Knesset faction and widespread opposition to his peace moves in the party's powerful Central Committee.

At least half of the Likud's Knesset faction opposed the unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank, Sharon's crowning foreign policy achievement. The Likud Central Committee, with a sizeable contingent of well-organized right-wingers, often rejected key policy initiatives.

"Staying in the Likud would have meant wasting time in internal political battles, rather than doing what needs to be done," Sharon declared at a news conference last Monday evening.

Political pundit Sima Kadmon, writing in Yediot Achronot, summed up the prime minister's dilemma: He could easily win re-election on a Likud ticket, but then wouldn't be able even to begin carrying out his political agenda.

"If he stayed in Likud, his victories would be undermined by an inability to form a coalition or to govern," Kadmon wrote.

To avoid the strength-sapping opposition he encountered as Likud leader, Sharon wants to reform Israel's political and party systems in ways that give the leader more power. Instead of unwieldy coalitions, he wants to introduce something like the American presidential system – and in his new party, there will be no potentially oppositional central committee.

"The Israeli people want to see politics in a different key," said Justice Minister Tzipi Livni, one of five Likud cabinet ministers who left Likud with Sharon.

In his news conference, Sharon insisted that there would be no further unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank, and he said he intends to scrupulously follow the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan – which envisages further Israeli territorial concessions, provided the Palestinians first meet their road map commitment to disarm terror groups.

Several leading pundits, however, are convinced that Sharon must have more up his sleeve: If all he wants is to mark time with the road map, there would have been no real reason for him to leave the Likud, they argue.

Ma'ariv editor Amnon Dankner maintains that, if he's re-elected, Sharon will put forward a far-reaching political plan.

"His confidants are speaking about the possibility of establishing a new, very far-reaching line as Israel's eastern border with the Palestinians, a line that will be decided on in consultation with the Americans," Dankner writes. "The pullback will be carried out with the understanding and cooperation of the Palestinian Authority in Ramallah, but only after the Americans announce that they recognize it at least as a temporary, de facto border, until a final settlement in the far distant future."

Dan Naveh, one of six Likud ministers who did not follow Sharon out of the party, claims that Sharon is only saying there will be no further withdrawals in order to attract Likud voters.

So far, 14 of the Likud's 40 Knesset members have joined Sharon. That's just enough to secure recognition by the Knesset as a breakaway faction entitled to significant public funding and airtime in the upcoming campaign.

The one prize Sharon wanted but didn't get was Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, who decided to stay in the Likud and compete for its leadership. Other prime candidates for Sharon's new party include Labor legislator Haim Ramon and the former chief of the Shin Bet, Avi Dichter.

The president of Ben-Gurion University, Avishai Braverman, a highly regarded economist who was originally thought to be joining Sharon has since indicated he will join Labor.

What are the new party's chances of success? In the past, several breakaway centrist parties have started with a bang and ended with a whimper. But none of those was led by a popular sitting prime minister, and initial polls suggest that Kadima is likely to do well.

A survey in Yediot Achronot, taken before Sharon announced his new party, already showed it garnering 28 seats, tied with Labor under its new chief, Amir Peretz. Both parties placed well ahead of a Likud led by the new leadership frontrunner, former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, which got 18 seats in the poll.

A survey published in the same paper after Sharon's announcement predicted Kadima would win 33 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, with Labor taking 26 seats and the Likud only 12, compared with the 40 it now holds.

Sharon, the general who helped combine five disparate parties to form the Likud in 1973 and create a real challenge to decades of uninterrupted Labor rule, has now moved to marginalize the party he claims is dangerously out of control.

If he succeeds, he will add another chapter to a remarkable military and political career. More importantly, his bold new initiative almost certainly will have major consequences for Israel's future.

'We are embarking on a new path'

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Statement on Nov. 21

To be honest, this is a difficult day to discuss the matter I wish to discuss, in light of the horrible act of terror carried out by the Hezbollah in Lebanon. [Under cover of an artillery barrage in which 11 Israelis were injured, Hezbollah attempted to infiltrate the north and kidnap some soldiers. They were thwarted. Four Hezbollah terrorists were killed.] This only shows us where we live, and why we must be vigilant, and the efforts we must make to continue fighting terror. I send my wishes for a speedy recovery to those who were injured today in this act of terror.

Good evening.

This morning I met with the president of Israel and asked his approval to dissolve the Knesset and move toward new elections as soon as possible. Following this, I began to establish a new, national liberal party in Israel together with my colleagues, who displayed courage and national responsibility.

After many misgivings, I decided to leave the Likud party today. In its present form, the Likud cannot lead Israel towards its national goals. I established the Likud to serve a national idea, and provide hope to the people of Israel. Unfortunately, it no longer exists there.

If I had stayed in the Likud, I would have probably won in the primaries, and would have led the Likud to victory in the elections. This would have been the safest move for me personally, however it is not the way to serve the State of Israel. Staying in the Likud means wasting time on political struggles, rather than acting on behalf of the State.

I prefer the good of the country to the comfortable and easy personal interest. The citizens of Israel gave me their trust. They did not elect me to warm a seat.

The new movement we are establishing today will serve the people of Israel for many years. It will be a new home for all the Israelis who want to act responsibly and with faith for the country, and realize the Zionist vision. I call on all who believe in this to join us, and move forward with us.

We are embarking on a new path – one that will provide Israel with genuine hope for stability, national responsibility, personal security, stable government, economic prosperity, tranquility and peace.

This is what the people of Israel need today. This is why I was elected, and I open myself up to the judgement of the voters today.

We face two great challenges. First, to lay the foundation for a peace agreement wherein the country's permanent borders will be determined, while insisting on the dismantling of terrorist organizations. This is not a new plan. I speak of the [internationally sponsored] "road map" [peace plan]. Disengagement gave us a historic opportunity, and I do not intend to allow anyone to squander it.

The second challenge is to put our own house in order, and to deal determinedly with poverty, educational gaps, crime and violence. This is not accomplished through slogans and empty promises, rather through action. I began the process, and I can complete it.

I have served the State of Israel for more than 60 years. I know its fields, borders, even its aromas – and primarily I know and love the citizens of this country. The citizens of Israel deserve leadership that acts, first and foremost, for the good of the public, and not for the narrow political interest. They deserve responsible, experienced and courageous leadership that operates with a strategic view of the future of the State of Israel.

The citizens of Israel placed their trust in me twice. I believe that I have proven my determination and my ability to act and accomplish things on their behalf. I believe that, God willing, they will place their faith in me a third time as well.

Thank you.

Is dinnertime family time?

Recent studies suggest that children do better in school if their family eats together. The study I read went even further, saying there was less drug use and school dropout rates decreased among those who had some nightly family time. Accordingly, dinnertime seems to be the ideal moment of family interconnection.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

For many, it makes perfect sense. We subscribe to the theory that if a family sits down to a calm and harmonious meal, wherein everyone gets a chance to discuss their day under the benign scrutiny of their parents, family ties are strengthened and children's self-esteem is enhanced. This, we believe, was our past heritage, ruined by modernity's fast-paced life.

But is that picture even close to the truth? In a rush to condemn the current frenetic dinnertime and praise an idyllic family meal, many forget the reality of history.

Family meals in the past seldom created this sense of calm on a daily level. In some cultures, mealtime reinforced family separateness and gender restrictions. Mom cooked, Dad was fed and children got leftovers, or they were fed early, then rushed off to bed. If there was a family meal, children were to be seen, not heard. Mealtime in many cultures is often very stressful. One study found that Yemenite couples fight the most about lunch. So meals do not automatically mean good behaviour or the advancement of loving relationships. History does not present us with a past pattern of dinner time as effective family time (except perhaps in the 1950s).

Nonetheless, we all know the absurdity of our fast-food, eat-alone-in-front-of-the-TV, grab-a-bite culture. It's not a healthy way to live or raise a family. Dinnertime can be a resource for a growing family. It can yield stronger ties and emotional stability. It can heal the fractious, disjointed, rushed nature of our social worlds. But, in our current culture, is this an impossible dream?

Given the improvement of career possibilities, gender advancement and egalitarian roles, it would be foolish to posit a return to a vision of women "barefoot in the kitchen" as a solution to all our woes. Making family time count must be a priority for the entire family, and surely for any parent. And it must be a practical and reality-based goal.

So, nightly family meals seem unworkable. But what about one or two meals a week? What about designating a time and a meal to family? Would our world, both private and public, not benefit? Perhaps we as Jews could share our tradition's solution – Shabbat. Once a week, there's no TV during dinner, friendly talk and relaxed, quality family time. And great food! I recommend it. It can be a mechayeh – a life-saver!

Honouring the generation of sacrifice

My mother's yahrzeit comes the week that we read the parshah Chayei Sarah. Sarah's death comes immediately after the story of the Akedah, Abraham's near-lethal offering of Isaac at God's command. This parshah always has a very large, very negative effect on me. Before we really know how she lived, Sarah's death grabs the headline.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The midrash imagines that Sarah died when she heard (from Satan, always the mischief-maker) that Abraham had made of their son a human sacrifice. Her life cannot have been much fun in the shadow of a husband like Abraham, who twice offered her as a concubine to pagan rulers and who is never once portrayed as showing any warmth, sympathy or caring for her suffering at the failure of the promised child to appear.

How much suffering is encapsulated in these few words: "Sarai was barren; she had no child." The biblical interpreter Aviva Zornberg argues that Sarah died not because of her fear that she had lost this precious child, but because she no longer wanted to live in a world fraught with such dangers.

It's obvious from the later story of Isaac – only when he takes Rebecca as wife is he "comforted" for the death of his mother – that any love Sarah got in her lifetime came from her son. I don't picture the household of Abraham and Sarah as a close and loving one. Abraham seems a stern and distant – and at times duplicitous – husband. Contrast this with the love Elkanah lavishes on Hannah, future mother of Samuel – "Am I not more to you than 10 sons?" he asks. So when I think of my birth family, I think not of Abraham and Sarah, but of the parents of Samuel. If life did not turn out for Hannah the way she wanted, she made it work for her.

On this anniversary, I went back to my mother's yearbook, class of Albright College 1926. She was 20 years old when she graduated with a degree in mathematics.

Here is what her friends wrote about her: "In every class, she shone the most brilliantly of all. During her study under Professor Keiss, she has won from him his lasting respect for her opinion in all things mathematical… And she must have enjoyed odd books, for even now she is much more interested in finding things out than is the average girl."

Except for that last slight slur on my gender, I look at her grad entry (it goes on for much longer) and wonder how she imagined her life would be.

Here is the class prediction for my mother's future: "It is 1936. Read with us the flyleaf of a late publication: Plane and Solid Geometry and Elements of Trigonometry. A new text compiled by Erma M. Maurey, M.A., University of Pennsylvania; Supervising Principal, Scranton High Schools."

Well, it didn't turn out that way. The Depression hit three years after my mother graduated, and she lost her teaching job in Pennsylvania's Northampton school district. She came home to her parents' house and became a church organist, a career that brought her great satisfaction through music, but it meant there would be no new math text, no master's degree from Penn, no career in the schools of Pennsylvania. Years later, to pay for my college education, she went back to teaching, combining this with her duties as church music director and pastor's wife. She carried out all of this with dignity and intelligence.

But if life did not turn out at all the way it looked for her in 1926, she certainly made it work for her. She had a loving and caring husband, and together they built a strong home for me, and a home open to all who needed refuge, comfort and caring. She didn't write that textbook, but she gave back to the world in many other ways.

My generation is losing, or has lost, its parents. With them goes a great generation of sacrifice. Some made that sacrifice on the battlefields of World War II or Korea. Some, like my mother, made it to the Depression, which changed so many lives and destroyed so many dreams. Some worked their lives away so that we would "have it better" than they did. Often, like Sarah, they buried their dreams in silence. It's up to us, their children and grandchildren, to honour how they lived their lives, to make sure that not only their deaths merit memory.

Iran's perspective on Canadian human rights

Led by Canada, some 38 United Nations member states are currently drafting a resolution condemning Iran for its "continued and barbarous" violations of human rights.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Canada's ambassador to the UN, Allan Rock, spearheaded the Canadian initiative condemning Iran of basic human rights violations. In response, the Iranian representative to the UN stated that "Canadians are being calculating, if anything… Canadians need to be accountable for their own human rights violations in front of the international community." A recent editorial in the Edmonton Journal described this allegation as a "whopper," a "big lie."

Let us talk about Iran and then Canada. Iran's president recently called for Israel to be "wiped off the map." This inflammatory remark constitutes a shameful display by any member state of the UN. Iran is governed in an autocratic fashion by religious fundamentalists who reject the West and any notion of compromise that mitigates their fundamentalist viewpoints. Moreover, the newly elected president achieved power in what an editorial in the International Herald Tribune recently described as a "sham democracy."

In some respects, Iran is a technologically advanced society, but its human rights record, including its lack of respect for women and lack of tolerance for any dissent, characterizes its real fabric.

We are starkly reminded of the brutal murder of Canadian photographer Zahra Kazemi following her arrest for taking pictures outside Tehran's Evin prison. This speaks volumes in respect of the state of freedom of the press in Iran. Iran claims that Kazemi's death was accidental. However, Iranian-born Shirin Ebadi, the 2003 Nobel Peace Prize laureate, among others, have maintained that Kazemi's skull had been split as a result of a deliberate killing.

In Canada, our human rights record is not perfect. For example, our aboriginal peoples are still subject to substandard living conditions in many parts of the country. We should not be proud if there was Canadian involvement in the so-called "rendering" process, by which the United States is alleged to hand over detainees to third nations for interrogation and torture, and in the case of Syrian-born Canadian Maher Arar, who was handed over to Syria by U.S. authorities and then tortured by the Syrians. As well, too many persons have recently been found wrongly convicted of murder. While our human rights record is not pristine, it compares favourably with that of any nation on earth.

We have constitutional protections afforded all of us by way of fundamental freedoms, including a vigorously free press, guarantees of equality and freedom from discrimination. We also have laws to protect against the propagation of hate. We, in Canada, enjoy the benefit of permanent, standing institutions to protect us, including police complaints and review boards, civilian-controlled police commissions and agencies that protect our privacy.

We live in a country that also respects the rule of law – we are all governed by laws, not persons, and all of us are subject, without exception, to the law.

For an Iranian leader to lecture Canada on human rights at the UN is an affront to Canadians and to the values we hold dear. It demonstrates in a dramatically ironic fashion that this messenger is not our mentor, nor indeed an individual whose remarks should be afforded any respect.

Canada is not immune from criticism. However, we continually strive to improve our standards of human rights in our laws and throughout society. And we certainly would never advocate the wiping of any nation off the map.

Iranian leaders would be better engaged if they looked introspectively into human rights in their own country. If Iran becomes a nuclear power, its national pride may be boosted, but its international stature will continue to be diminished as a result of its bellicose, undemocratic nature together with its dismal human rights record.

The Kirshner File

Sharon and Peretz shake up Israeli politics

Israel's political landscape has been transformed by a series of events that, while not entirely surprising, have been quite shocking. The realignment began with Amir Peretz's victory in the Labor party primary on Nov. 9 when he defeated the incumbent, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, for the party's leadership. Observers did not expect Peres, the 82-year-old warhorse of the Ashkenazi establishment, to be turfed out by Peretz, the 53-year-old Sephardi dark-horse candidate who was still a boy in Morocco when Peres was already a dominant figure in Israel.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Having bested Peres, Peretz announced his intention to pull the Labour party out of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's shaky coalition government and called for elections, the sooner the better.

Peres, who has held every major important job in Israeli politics, from the defence portfolio to the prime ministership, had opposed calls from mavericks such as Peretz to pull the plug on Sharon. He argued that the party should remain in the coalition until next November's general election, saying that Israel could not afford the luxury of uncertainty in the wake of its unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip in September.

To placate his critics, Peres promised that the party would remain in Sharon's cabinet only if four conditions were met: resolving outstanding issues related to the disengagement from Gaza, such as border crossings; launching negotiations with the Palestinian Authority on the basis of the 2003, internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan; channelling state funds to combat poverty, which is an increasingly serious problem in Israel; and placing much greater emphasis on developing the Galilee – where Israeli Arabs outnumber Jews by a small margin – and the Negev, Israel's underpopulated desert area.

Had Peres sidelined Peretz, the party would have stayed in Sharon's government and the status quo would have prevailed. But with Peretz's unexpected triumph, relatively razor thin though it was, all bets were off. At Peretz's insistence, all eight Labour party ministers, including Peres, submitted their resignations, and suddenly, Sharon was faced with an entirely new situation.

Having embittered and alienated many of his supporters by giving up Gaza and displacing more than 8,000 Jewish settlers there, Sharon created an unbridgeable breach in the Likud party, which he co-founded in 1973.

From the moment Sharon signalled his intention to jettison Gaza – which he had always maintained was necessary for Israel's defence – his status in the Likud became untenable. He was denounced as a traitor who had broken faith with his followers and branded a closet peacenik. Some of his supporters, notably Minister of Education Limor Livnat and Minister of Agriculture Yisrael Katz, grumbled. Benjamin Netanyahu, the finance minister and Sharon's perennial rival, resigned, following in the footsteps of Uzi Landau, the prototypical hardliner.

As long as Sharon could count on Peres' support, he could carry on and virtually ignore the dissension brewing and boiling over in the Likud. But with Peretz's ascendancy, Sharon realized that his government's days were numbered.

Pundits had already speculated that Sharon, 77, would bolt the Likud and form a centre-right party should his Labour party safety net disappear. Last week, Sharon announced the formation of the Kadima party, leaving Likud leaderless and adrift. Finally admitting that life in the Likud had become "insufferable," Sharon declared that he would not stand idly by as Likud rebels hammered away at the "historic opportunity" created by the Gaza withdrawal.

One-third of Likud MKs, including Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Internal Security Minister Gideon Ezra and Transportation Minister Meir Sheetrit, joined Sharon, thereby enabling the Kadima party to qualify for state funding.

Shaul Mofaz, the powerful minister of defence and former chief of staff of the Israeli army, resisted Sharon's entreaties and decided to contest the Likud leadership. The matter will be resolved at a convention on Dec.19. Apart from Mofaz and Netanyahu, the other main candidates are Silvan Shalom, the foreign minister, and Livnat.

Once the succession issue is settled, the contenders can focus on the election, which is due to be held on March 28. It will be the third election in five years, a fact that attests to political turbulence in Israel.

It is indeed true that the events of the past few weeks are seismic in nature and may yet alter Israeli politics for years to come.

Israelis, however, are accustomed to upheaval.

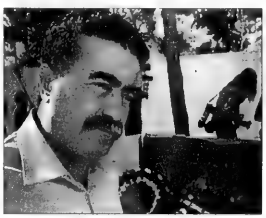
In 1963, hard on the heels of the Lavon affair, David Ben-Gurion, the country's first and greatest prime minister, broke ranks with the Labor party and formed the breakaway Rafi faction, which petered out within five years.

The sitting prime minister, Golda Meir, stepped down under pressure in 1974, her reputation in tatters in the wake of the Yom Kippur War. Yigael Yadin – the archeologist and chief of staff from 1949 to 1952 – and Amnon Rubenstein – a Tel Aviv University law professor – established the centrist party Democratic Movement for Change in 1976. DASH, as it was known, won 15 Knesset seats in the 1977 election, which brought the Likud's Menachem Begin to power. DASH soon disintegrated.

Ariel Sharon

Similarly, the centre party concocted by Amnon Lipkin Shahak and Yitzhak Mordechai in 1999 collapsed months after its formation.

The Kadima party may meet the same fate. But for now, Sharon is riding high, as public opinion polls indicate. By moving to the centre and conclusively unmasking Likud as an antediluvian party incapable of embracing geopolitical realities, from the ticking demographic time bomb to the legitimate grievances of mainstream Palestinians, Sharon stands on the brink of modifying his heretofore hawkish image and, perhaps, reinventing himself as a politician of crossover appeal, whose success may be to the detriment of Likud and the centrist Shinui party.



Amir Peretz

Sharon has already staked out his positions on the Palestinians. He favours long-term interim agreements rather than a permanent-status settlement. He talks of reinvigorating the yet-to-be-implemented road map. Although he appears to oppose further unilateral pullouts, he has essentially adopted a unilateralist approach that would see Israel retain major settlement blocs in the West Bank and tolerate a truncated Palestinian state.

Last week, one of his top advisers, Eyal Arad, disclosed that Sharon wants to replace the land-for-peace equation with "a much more realistic formula – security for independence." It is not entirely clear what that may mean.

Sharon, the godfather of the settlements, is suspicious of Palestinian intentions, prone to the belief that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is too weak to be a reliable partner and convinced that he lacks the will to crack down on the infrastructure of terrorism. Sharon, like Mofaz, may well believe that achieving peace with the current generation of Palestinian leaders is impossible.

Sharon has not concentrated on domestic policy, but under his watch, welfare benefits, including child allowances, were slashed, much to Peretz's condemnation.

Peretz – who immigrated to Israel in 1956 and was mayor of Sderot before being elected to the Knesset in 1988 and the chairmanship of the Histadrut labour federation in 1995 – is anything but a neo-conservative on economic policy. As head of the Am Ehad party, which merged with the Labor party in 2004, he urged Sharon to reverse free market reforms, restore social welfare policies and raise the minimum wage – this in a country where almost one in five families lives below the poverty line and poverty among the elderly has reached crisis proportions.

A social democratic reformer, Peretz wants to narrow the gap between haves and have-nots and win back the allegiance of Sephardi working-class voters, who defected to the Likud 28 years ago. "I would like to be the Menachem Begin of the Labor party, to return it to the social values… of the people," he said recently.

On foreign policy, Peretz is dovish. He was an early member of Peace Now. He regards Abbas as a negotiating partner. He wants to preserve the momentum of the Gaza withdrawal by engaging the Palestinians in talks aimed at a fair, lasting solution. In mid-November, he submitted a Knesset bill which, if passed, would grant compensation to West Bank settlers who leave voluntarily.

Judging by last week's polls, Peretz will fall short of beating Sharon in the forthcoming election. But he and Sharon have already succeeded in shaking up Israeli politics.

BJE teachers become students on PD days

For kids, they're a day off; for parents, they're a day-care headache; but for teachers, professional development (PD) days are an opportunity to hone their skills and learn from experts.

More than 1400 teachers attended the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education's PD days on November 13 and 14. They represented a wide range of Jewish education in Toronto - supplementary schools and day schools, preschools and high schools, general and Judaic studies.

At the November 13 session which was designed for supplementary school teachers, participants chose among four tracks, each focusing on a different approach to education.

"Moving our program to a track system has allowed us to delve deeper into topic areas that can have a great impact on students in the classroom," said BJE consultant Chari Schwartz.

BJE teachers took a hands - on approach to learning new techniques during the recent PD day.

In the Differentiated Learning track, teachers learned to recognize students' varying background knowledge, readiness, preferences and interests and how to adjust their teaching accordingly to maximize student learning. Other tracks included Experiential Learning, Jewish Family Education and Jewish Text Learning in Hevruta.

On November 14 it was the day school teachers' turn. They came not only from Toronto, but from Ottawa, London and Hamilton as well. The program for the day was developed with input from teacher focus groups for all grades. Teachers and principals gave presenters feedback from the previous year and suggested topics they would benefit from. "We use this PD Day to launch new professional development initiatives, which schools often follow up on during the year with their own staff," said the BJE's Silvia Eilath.

This year, day school teachers were able to learn with outstanding presenters from Israel, New York, Chicago and even New Orleans, as well as Toronto. Teachers chose among workshops ranging from how to "train the brain" or "organize the disorganized learner" to "cyber-bullying" and "teaching writing across the curriculum" in sessions suitable for both Judaic and General Studies teachers, with many content and grade specific sessions offered. The array of sessions for Judaic studies teachers included Hebrew through Fun, and Teaching Israel through Popular Culture. Judaic studies teachers also learned how to use short trigger films in their teaching and how to integrate art and drama into their curriculum. "The fact that we run these PD days and try to be as inclusive as possible to all aspects of community and practice is part of what makes our community so special," said Schwartz.

Strengthening day schools through PEJE

If you've noticed an improvement in the quality of your children's education, you can credit, among other factors, the expanding relationship between the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE).

A partnership between the two organizations is helping Toronto's day schools to provide excellence in Jewish education. "This relationship allows us to enhance and strengthen the day schools because of the resources that PEJE brings," says Shirley Worth, UJA Federation's director for donor development, who specializes in Jewish education.

PEJE was founded in 1997 by Michael Steinhardt and Rabbi Yitz Greenberg to create a vibrant and sustainable Jewish future through strengthening the Jewish day school movement in North America. PEJE makes grants, provides expertise, and advocates for the day school movement.

The partnership has exposed Toronto's Jewish educators to cutting-edge resources. Schools can tap into PEJE's North America-wide research and see what their peers in other communities are doing. PEJE resources in the areas of governance, fundraising and marketing are especially useful.

"They've helped the schools look at the fact that they must be self-critical. There is a path to enhancing what they're currently doing," says Worth.

The BJE is currently running a series of workshops utilizing PEJE experts. "We've had wonderful leadership attendance from the schools," says Worth. "It's our goal to strengthen and enhance the ability of our schools to provide excellence in Jewish education to their students."

In addition to attending conferences and workshops organized by the BJE, schools have access to PEJE experts for individualized advice. Among the schools that have brought specialists to Toronto are Associated, CHAT and Bialik. Worth is thrilled with the partnership to date, and says that, as a result, Jewish day schools will be able to promote the value of Jewish education and attract more families.

Jewish camps offer much more than summer fun

When you think of camp, do you think of swimming? Crafts? Sports? For Jewish camps, the summer is also a time to learn more about religion, traditions and history.

Jewish summer camps have a wide range of perspectives and approaches, but all agree on one thing: if you want to teach kids about being Jewish, camp is an ideal place to do it.

Camp Ramah identifies itself as "a Jewish educational institution in the setting of a summer camp." All campers participate in informal classes on topics such as Judaism in nature or the weekly Torah portion. These classes are held outside and are discussion-based – and there is no homework or tests.

In October, representatives from eight of Ontario's Jewish camps were on hand to answer parents' questions at the Jewish Camp Fair, held at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Jewish education also extends to everyday activities like sports or arts where staff members teach Jewish values. And campers learn more about being Jewish by living in an environment where Shabbat, kashrut, and tefillah (prayer) are normalized. "We find camp's the best way to teach Jewish values because you're not teaching it, you're living it. It's a natural part of who they are," says Camp Director Michael Wolf.

At Camp George–a Union for Reform Judaism camp–educational opportunities are integrated into everyday activities. A ropes course activity, for instance, becomes an opportunity to simulate the exodus from Egypt. "Israel Day" utilizes different parts of the camp to reflect different geographical areas in Israel.

The camp's director, Dr. Ron Polster, a former Jewish day school teacher, says that education can be more engaging at camp. "The things that discouraged me most were bells and walls. In a school environment, education stops at a certain point in time and you move on. In a camp environment, it's wide open and everything is a potential educational opportunity."

At Moshava, campers work with an educator over the course of the summer. Each educator takes a different approach to the summer's theme – which is religious Zionist in nature – but each aims to make learning fun and entertaining.

"We don't want to give the kids a break from education, we want them to learn without realizing it," says Director Miriam Allman. The camp emphasizes hands-on learning. Two years ago, the summer's theme was the ingathering of Jews from different parts of the world. When learning about the Jews from Yemen, campers made Yemenite tzitzit, which are different from the tzitzit they are accustomed to. Allman believes that Jewish camping plays an important role in strengthening Jewish identity. "It's a part of who we are 365 days a year," she says. "So if you are a Jew, you're a Jew. You're not a Jew 10 months a year and take a break during the summer."

Early intervention Before small problems become big ones

Heather Finestone, the Board of Jewish Education's early intervention consultant, remembers the moment when a special child started laughing. Finestone was reading a story to a child who was an elective mute. Suddenly the child began laughing hysterically, and talking. Talking so loudly in fact, that her teacher, not realizing that the noise was coming from the student who never spoke, asked for quiet in the room. That girl is just one of the children that Finestone has helped through her role with the Tikun Chaim Senior Kindergarten Early Intervention Program. Tikun Chaim is the special education arm of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education.

Finestone uses books, number charts and the alphabet, among her many materials to screen senior kindergarten children for gaps in their learning. The goal is to intervene before little problems become big problems. "The earlier you pick something up and address it, the less serious it will be," she says. One useful aspect of this screening, according to Finestone, is that it takes place in the presence of the classroom teacher. Not only does this make the screening a non-threatening situation for the children, but the teacher can also inform her if a child's responses are atypical. After the screening the teacher receives a profile of her class as a whole, as well as for each child. "The classroom teacher, and senior special education staff, are then able to obtain a global view of the strengths and needs within the classes as well as gaps," says Finestone. "It helps the teachers create programs that reflect the individual profiles of their students."

The screening was developed specifically to identify children who are having difficulties with skills such as oral language, phonics or numeracy. Another common problem at this age concerns fine motor skills. "Sometimes it's as simple as introducing alternative ways of holding a pencil properly," says Finestone. That may sound trivial, but identifying minor problems like these early can make a huge difference in long-term learning.

Heather Finestone, the BJE's early intervention consultant, works with senior kindergarten students at Associated Hebrew School, Kamin campus.

Some children need to meet with Finestone for intervention only a few times during the academic year, while others require more extensive support. "A small percentage of children in any given class require intervention throughout the year," she says. "These children are pre-screened in May to determine how they have progressed during the year."

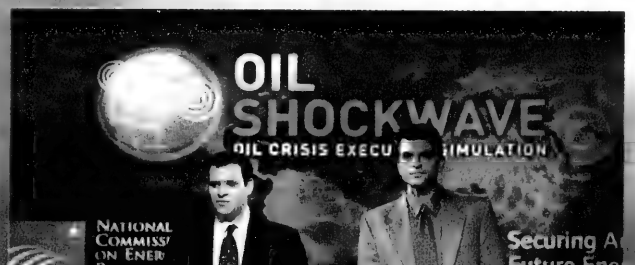
The senior kindergarten intervention program, which began in 2003, was initially developed by Dr. Karen Gazith, Director Educational Services, Bronfman Jewish Education Centre, Montreal. In Toronto, it currently supports children in selected classes at Associated Hebrew Schools Kamin campus, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Netivot HaTorah Day School, and Eitz Chaim Schools Viewmount campus.

Eventually, Finestone would like to see the program made available to all senior kindergarten classes in all BJE affiliated schools.

Where Are they Now?

Since Toronto's Jewish school system was established decades ago, thousands of its graduates have gone on to achieve enormous success in business, public life, and community affairs. In this feature, we profile one such success story, a graduate of Yeshivat Or Chaim

Robbie Diamond



Robbie Diamond (l) with Jason Grumet, Executive Director of the National Commission on Energy Policy.

"I'm pleased to hear of your interest in politics, but you should know that it is a dangerous disease." So said the note that Robbie Diamond received from former Federal Cabinet Minister, Bill McKnight after sitting with him at a Canada-Israel Committee dinner 16 years ago.

It turns out McKnight was right. Diamond never shook the politics bug.

Today Diamond, 31, is the president of Securing America's Future Energy (SAFE), an organization he founded approximately one year ago.

In that short span of time, SAFE has become highly regarded, attracting individuals such as Dennis Ross, former US Envoy to the Middle East, and R. James Woolsey, former Director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, to its advisory board.

SAFE is an action-oriented, nonpartisan organization that aims to reduce America's dependence on oil. The organization jumped to national attention with its first event, Oil Shockwave, developed in partnership with the National Commission on Energy Policy.

Posing as cabinet members, the participants responded to a series of events affecting world oil supplies. "It ultimately showed that it takes a very small amount of oil off the market to cause the price to rise dramatically," says Diamond. "Our whole point was to explore the fact that if you weren't prepared for this crisis, it would take a long time to recover."

As a student at Or Chaim, Diamond demonstrated an aptitude for politics. He was the president of his senior class at Or Chaim, and says that he talked about politics all the time. "Or Chaim was a great school that had great teachers. It really provided all the tools that you wanted to make of it."

Diamond also appreciates the edge that the double curriculum provided. "Studying Talmud was extremely helpful because it helps you think analytically."

While studying political science and peace and conflict studies at the University of Toronto, Diamond was also the associate chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress national executive.

Diamond lives in Washington with his wife Shari, a doctor at George Washington University Hospital, and their two daughters.

Shul gives beginners a crash course in Hebrew

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Anne Shendroff is crazy about Israel.

The grandmother of day-school children visits often, and she even lived there for three months recently.

Yet, like many Canadian Jews, she doesn't know Hebrew – a fact she's determined to change.

Which is what brought her to Congregation Darchei Noam's second annual "Learn Hebrew Reading in a Day" on Nov. 20.

It's hard to imagine learning an entire language in an eight-hour day, but after just a few minutes of teacher Marcia Gilbert's friendly, casual instruction, the class's goal – a solid grounding in the Hebrew alphabet and basic Hebrew reading – started to seem attainable.

Gilbert took a phonetic approach, and the emphasis was on reading Hebrew – comprehension and vocabulary-building were not the main focus.

Instead, she taught participants the letters one at a time using English vocabulary – such as hate, bait and hotel – that was transliterated into Hebrew characters.

There was also a peppering of Hebrew and Yiddish, and participants' eyes lit up as they read familiar words – such as Torah, shofar, tov and tovah – that their Hebrew-literate friends, children or even grandchildren may take for granted.

Each letter was introduced by its physical characteristics – differentiating the letters "hay" and "chet," for example, is easy if you look for the hole in the hay, Gilbert said.

The chet, she noted, looks like a bump on the top of a challah (a word that starts with chet).

Gilbert has been teaching adults Hebrew for 23 years. Much of her approach, she said, is drawn from the late Rabbi Noah Golinkin, who pioneered a crash course for adults in the late 1980s and came to Canada in the 1990s to share his methods.

Rabbi Golinkin believed Hebrew was essential to Diaspora Judaism, saying, "Those who cannot read must learn. Those who can read must teach."

Gilbert, who also teaches a Reform movement "Introduction to Judaism" class, brings her own passion to Rabbi Golinkin's message that "Judaism has never been a spectator sport."

She said Hebrew's phonetic nature makes it very accessible, even to those who feel they can't possibly learn to read the language.

She's taught dyslexic students, developmentally delayed adults and non-English speakers.

"Give it a try," she urges beginners of all ages.

With Gilbert's help, Shedroff was quickly reading aloud in class and looking forward to reading menus and signs the next time she goes to Israel.

"She's unbelievable," Shedroff said. "Languages are not my forte."

Myer Siemiatycki, another student, said, "It's easy to decode the lettering in the hands of a gifted teacher."

In his mid-50s, Siemiatycki is very much a beginner, but as a board member of Darchei Noam and Shabbat regular, he felt it was time to get a better understanding of prayer services, which are mostly in Hebrew.

"It's amazing how much you can cover in a short time," he said.

At his age, he added, not knowing Hebrew can seem an insurmountable obstacle, "but it's never too late."

Ana Bodnar is a member of the Danforth Jewish Circle and sings in its choir. She said she looks forward to singing from the Hebrew side of the page, not the transliteration, from now on.

Although learning Hebrew in a day was as easy as she hoped, she said hanging onto what she and the others learned may be another story.

"The thing will be to practise and make sure you remember," she said.

There was palpable enthusiasm in the room, as participants made their way through the alef-bet one letter at a time.

One class member raised her hand to ask why two letters have a "T" sound. This led to a discussion about how sensible Hebrew is when compared to an irregular language such as English – "Look at Queen's Quay," one Spanish-speaking participant noted.

The full-day class took a break halfway through for lunch – not challah, but tuna, Siemiatycki joked.

Seizing the moment, Gilbert introduced a new letter, "nun," and phonetically spelled out the word "tuna" on the board.

Associated hosts largest reunion in its history

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Associated Hebrew Schools organized the largest reunion in its history to help alumni reconnect with their childhood friends and sweethearts and remind them of the education that helped shape their lives.

The reunion, held last Sunday at Associated's Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill, saw 800 former students, staff and administration take a walk down memory lane.

Aurelia Ostro and Mayeer Pearl, Associated graduates and co-chairs of the reunion, said the event, which was eight months in the making, was a great way to celebrate the school's history, as well as help people become involved in the Jewish community.

"About a year ago, we had this idea that we had a lot of years behind us, we're approaching our 100th anniversary... so we created an alumni committee, and we discussed what we wanted to do. We decided on a reunion," Pearl said.

"People are reconnecting with friends they haven't seen in years," he added, referring to the Kamin centre's packed auditorium.

"It's wonderful to see a smile on everyone's face," Ostro said.

Although there have been class reunions over the years, this is first time Associated has staged a school-wide reunion of this scale.

"We went through our archives and pulled out a lot of old pictures," Ostro said.

"We have a program where in each classroom we've created memory boards of photos and newspaper clippings," she added.

The memorabilia was organized by decade and half-decade, with classrooms featuring groups of the school's alumni throughout the 98-year history.

The turnout for the reunion, which welcomed former students regardless of whether they were graduates, exceeded Pearl's expectations.

"I think our initial expectations were conservative. Our initial goal was to create awareness, to say, 'Our school is out there, remember us,'" he said, adding that he was thrilled that people were lining up at the door to get in.

"We wanted to reach out to our alumni in their 30s and 40s today. Ultimately, it was for recruitment of young parents to remind them of where they went and the type of education they got. Hopefully, they are happy with it," Pearl said.

Associated, and other Jewish day schools have struggled with decreased enrolment in recent years, acknowledged Mark Smiley, Associated's director of education, but he said people need to focus on reasons to celebrate.

"A school with this kind of history and legacy was not doing all it should to celebrate on a more regular basis. Harvard [University] doesn't have to justify why it is having a reunion, and neither should Associated," he said.

"We just want to have a party," added Smiley, a 1972 graduate.

On the other hand, Smiley said he hoped the event would remind people of the school's legacy, adding that if parents do choose to provide their children with a Jewish education, they should know there is a place for them at Associated.

"The school has a warm place in people's hearts," Smiley said.

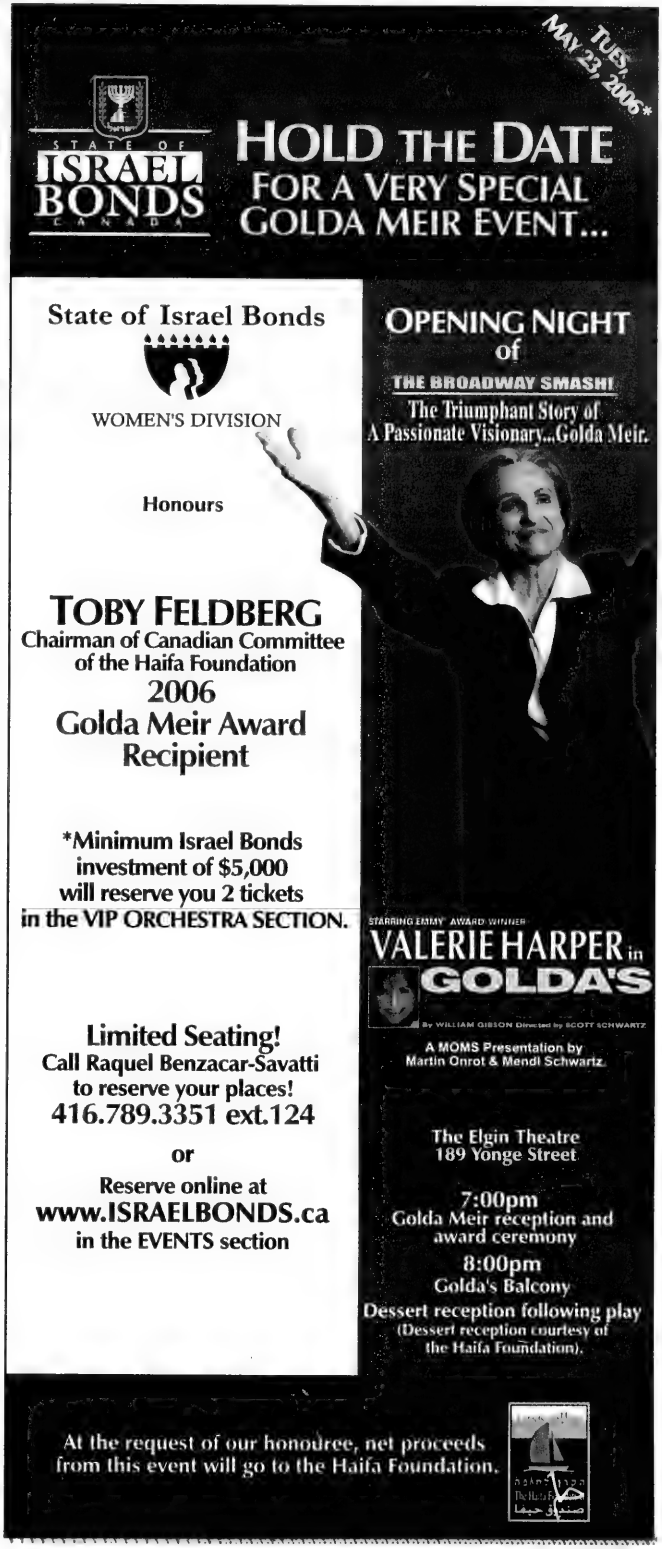
Associated's vice-president David Brown said the reunion was a good excuse to celebrate a school that has provided a Jewish education to Torontonians for almost a century.

"In 2007, it will be Associated's 100th birthday and as a prelude, getting everybody together to celebrate the largest Jewish day school in the Diaspora, this is a really good event," Brown said.

"We don't normally get to see a lot of our alumni, because a lot of them are spread all over the world, so it is just a neat thing to be able to catch up," he added.

Brown, who graduated from Associated in 1970, said he was happy to see people in a classroom that featured memorabilia from 1907-1940 searching for their friends in the pictures.

While it's still uncertain how proceeds from the reunion will be spent – attendees were charged $18 in advance and $20 at the door – Pearl said the money will go toward improving the school through renovations, programs or scholarships.



Non-profit Mideast news agency strives for balance

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Since its inception more than four years ago, The Media Line (TML) has worked hard to brand itself as an independent and professional organization that reports the news from the Middle East without bias.

Bureau chief David Harris likes to point to the fact newspapers and TV outlets in the United States (mostly in states that voted Republican in the 2004 U.S. presidential election) have picked up the service, as has the Palestinian paper of record, Al-Quds, indicating TML has at least partly achieved that goal.

Al-Quds, the most prestigious of the Palestinian papers, which prides itself on its independence, runs TML contributions each week. Maan Television, a Palestinian Authority network, also picks up its one- to four-minute video vignettes, Harris said.

A native of Manchester, England, Harris has worked for the BBC and served as an economics and political correspondent for the Jerusalem Post. While attending the GA in Toronto recently, Harris told The CJN that The Media Line is carving out a niche mostly among smaller publications and television stations that appreciate its unique take on Mideastern events.

While Al-Quds might be impressive on the Media Line's resume, the service's business plan remains primarily focused on the United States. If you look to smaller centres, in places such as Pascagoula, Miss., Duluth, Minn., and rural Oregon, you'll find TML material included in local papers' international coverage, Harris said.

TML also provides its commentary and punditry packages to thousands of communities through the Salem Radio network, USA Radio Network, Deutsche Welle and affiliates of major U.S. radio networks such as ABC, CBS and ClearChannel.

As well, The Media Line offers a one-hour radio program called Mideast Sunday, and it produces material ranging from full documentaries to one- or two-minute vignettes.

On the print side, TML has provided more than 4,000 articles to its own website, www.themedialine.org, and to newspapers around the world.

TML also produces and distributes two- to five-minute news packages for television stations.

Its research shows that 70 per cent of all North Americans, including Canadians, never go to a national source for news. Instead, they favour local stations and papers, and even people who do get their news from national papers and broadcasters also rely on local outlets, Harris said.

TML is still a fairly small operation. It employs two reporters who speak Arabic, Hebrew and English, as well as a couple of technicians and a number of freelancers and stringers in countries ranging from Saudi Arabia to Egypt to the Palestinian territories.

It was founded by Felice and Michael Friedson, Americans who moved to Israel from Florida about five years ago.

Felice Friedson also founded the Middle East Press Club earlier this year, a TML project that brings together mostly Israeli and Palestinian journalists to discuss coverage of the region and to develop professional relationships.

The Media Line is currently funded primarily by grants from a number of family foundations, as well as through small fees charged to its customers. It plans to eventually shift from its current non-profit model to become a for-profit enterprise.

Israelis, Palestinians not partners in peace: editor

Problem started with handshake between Rabin and Arafat on lawn of the White House

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The conflict between Israelis and Palestinians is due in part to a hesitation most Israelis feel about making a partnership with Palestinians, said David Horovitz, the editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post.

Horovitz was speaking at a recent lecture organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto as part of the "Israel New Media Series."

He said that the meeting between the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and the late Israeli prime minister Yitzak Rabin in 1993 at the start of the Oslo process was metaphorical of the hesitation that Israelis feel when attempting to make a partnership with Palestinians.

"In 1993, on the White House lawn, there was a handshake… Arafat thrusts out his arm with great enthusiasm, because here he is, on the world stage, purportedly making the shift from terrorist to statesman and Rabin, who knew in advance that he was going to be asked to shake hands … hesitates," Horovitz said.

"Rabin said that he wasn't certain this was a partnership he should explore, but he felt that he should. Here was the leader of the Palestinians who had been overtly dedicated to the armed struggle, now saying he genuinely saw a two-state solution and Rabin decided to try it.

"That hesitation that you saw emblemized not just Rabin's uncertainty, but Israel's."

Horvitz said one just has to analyze the outcome of Israeli elections since the early 1990s to see that Israel was a nation that couldn't make up its mind, as Israel shifted from a left-wing to a right-wing government five times since then.

He said that the uncertainty turned into hopelessness after the Camp David negotiations in 2000 fell apart. It was then that a majority of Israelis believed that a partnership with Palestinians was impossible.

Horovitz also said that opposing perceptions of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict are keeping the two sides from reaching common ground.

For instance, Horovitz said that if Arafat had attempted to spread the message that for a two-state solution to work, Palestinians would have to acknowledge Israel's right to sovereignty and that Israel shouldn't be expected to "commit national suicide" by having millions of Palestinians move to Israel, they may have reached a peaceful resolution.

Horovitz said that most Palestinians believe that if former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak had offered more to the Palestinians at Camp David, there would be peace in Israel, while most Israelis feel that if the intifadah was really based on a territorial dispute, a deal would have been reached by now.

He said that most Palestinians believe that they were forced into the cycle of violence to liberate Gaza, the West Bank and east Jerusalem after now-Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who was then the leader of the Likud party, visited Temple Mount in Jerusalem in 2000.

"If the goal were merely to force Israel out of disputed territory that was captured in 1967, then they haven't followed their own strategy. Had the attacks over the last five years… been focused entirely over disputed territory, the campaign would have been more effective from a Palestinian point of view," Horovitz said.

"Most of the fatalities, most of the casualties, most of the attacks have taken place in sovereign, undisputed Israel, in shopping malls and on buses and therefore denied many people in Israel, who wanted to say that this wouldn't happen if we weren't in the territories, that argument."

Horovitz said that most Israelis feel Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is well intentioned but too rhetorical.

"If there isn't a Palestinian leadership that is willing to work against terrorist organizations, to marginalize and arrest and prevent them from carrying out attacks, nothing is going to get done."

USYers pack clothes for victims of Katrina

BY ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When they arrived, the room at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue was littered with scattered bags, boxes, jackets, shoes, shampoo bottles and countless other items.

Three hours later, a cadre of 20 United Synagogue Youth (USY) members working had successfully sorted, packed and sealed everything up into nearly 60 boxes.

All of it was slated for delivery to victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"It was a lot of work," said Phil Birnbaum, a co-organizer of the program and vice-president of the youth group's eastern region social action/tikkun olam committee.

"I don't know how many families will benefit, but it felt good being able to help out and... I'm really proud of everyone involved."

The program, dubbed the "10 days of RePANTance," involved soliciting donations of household goods from members of several Toronto-area synagogues during the days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

After advertising the program with flyers and e-mails, "we ended up collecting an overwhelming amount of items – much more than what we expected," said Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder, USY's director of youth activities, who co-ordinated the effort.

Once the collection stage was complete, Greenbaum-Shinder said it took about five car trips to bring it all to the USY regional office in Toronto.

Then came the recent mass packing exercise at Beth Emeth.

"Twenty kids together brought it to Beth Emeth, dumped it on the floor and sorted everything by category and repacked it into boxes," she explained.

Members and advisors from USY are pictured with the boxes of donated goods they packed for victims of Katrina.

Greenbaum-Shinder enlisted the help of the Yellow Freight shipping company, which recently transported the goods, free of charge, to the Central Dallas Ministry, which will distribute the items to people who need them.

While this may not be the first or last aid shipment to Katrina victims, Birnbaum, 17, noted that the flurry of aid that came in the immediate aftermath of the storm has since tapered off, making such an endeavour even more important now.

"All of the support came at once in September and October, and a lot of it has now died down," said the Langstaff Secondary School Grade 12 student.

"It's almost three months later and help is still very much needed."

Greenbaum-Shinder said the initiative has taught USY members a valuable real-word lesson about tzedakah.

"If you want to teach youth about tikkun olam, then you need to embody the characteristics of it," she said.

"This is something we see as truly helping out other people in the world."

Media applaud Sharon's break with Likud

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

When breaking the news that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was leaving Likud to set up a centrist political party, many journalists used geological or cosmic metaphors to describe the change: "an earthquake"; "a tectonic shift"; "a realignment of the stars."

International reaction to Sharon himself was very favourable. The prime minister is seen as a statesman in the latter stages of his political life trying, in a major gamble, to fulfill the longing for peace and security felt by Israel's centrist majority.

The news reports were quickly followed by analysis of how Sharon's decision would affect Israel and especially the peace process.

The Regina Leader-Post editorial, "Sharon proposes pro-peace party" (Nov. 22) said: "So what does [Sharon's move] mean for peace in the Middle East? It certainly gives new hope to Israeli moderates and pragmatists who would prefer a durable accommodation with their Palestinian counterparts. But it will mean little in the long term unless matched by the Palestinians.

"The late [Palestinian Authority president] Yasser Arafat was too fearful of using up his own political capital among Palestinians to make a much-needed bold step toward peace. His successor, [Mahmoud] Abbas, began with some promise, but has not delivered any tangible change – so far.

"Sharon has made his move. The Palestinians must reply in kind."

In an interview on As It Happens (CBC Radio, Nov. 21), Gerald Steinberg, head of Bar-Ilan University's Conflict Resolution Program, warned against jumping to the conclusion that peace is at hand.

Steinberg remarked: "The Israeli public has understood that this conflict... is not going to be resolved through some sort of magic formula. We tried that with Oslo, and the vast majority of Israelis recognized that, and that's why there's huge support for disengagement. That situation is the best we're going to get.

"There really is no Palestinian leadership, but there's a figurehead leadership... [with] no real capability of making the basic historic changes that need to be made.

"Israelis understand that, and I think, slowly, the rest of the world is beginning to understand that too."

Steinberg commented that "it's important to change the vocabulary" and speak about "managing the conflict" not – at least for now – about achieving a comprehensive peace agreement (especially, as other analysts have pointed out, with the rejectionist group Hamas vying for inclusion in the Palestinian government).

Others were more optimistic. In a Globe and Mail opinion piece ("Israel's stars are being realigned," Nov. 22), Emanuel Adler, who holds the Andrea and Charles Bronfman chair in Israeli studies at the University of Toronto, wrote that Sharon's decision to quit the Likud "already shows his willingness to pursue a peace process with the Palestinians."

The Globe editorial "Ariel Sharon's way" (Nov. 22) noted that if Sharon wins the coming election as head of a new centrist party, he will be unconstrained by Likud hawks and "free to make the concessions that Israel must make for its peace and security, such as withdrawing from unnecessary Jewish settlements."

While the Globe wishes Sharon well, the paper might also consider the other side of the equation: the need for a Palestinian partner who can deliver genuine peace and security. In the absence of a reliable partner, raised expectations of what Sharon can do may be sadly thwarted.

Assessing the significance of Israel's complex, unpredictable political landscape is a constant challenge for the media. But in the meantime, the favourable press Sharon has received, along with praise for new Labor leader Amir Peretz, has engendered more positive attitudes toward Israel in general.

Jewish Life

Who we are vs. what we do

By RABBI AVRAM ROTHMAN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

I am what I am, not what I do.

Although I must admit that I do not find myself at cocktail parties often, I certainly can imagine the following scenario: A man and woman approach me and introduces themselves. "I'm George, and I'm a lawyer," he proudly states, "and this is my wife, Beverly – she is an accountant."

Now, I am anticipating the question, "And who are you?" I can see the future, and I am far from being a prophet.

"Me? I'm a rabbi," I answer. I see the quick look between them and I can imagine their thoughts, "A rabbi? Uh-oh!"

Sometimes, I think that when I tell people that I am a rabbi, I may as well have told them that I am the chief of Revenue Canada's investigative department or the Canadian representative of the House Un-American Activities Committee. I suddenly become, in their minds, the rabbi of their nightmares, leading Hebrew school with a ruler in one hand and the fragrant breath of herring and schnapps.

You see, people too often identify us, our personality or our essence by our occupation. They hear that we are a teacher, an insurance agent, a car salesman, a professor or a policeman and immediately pigeonhole us by the stereotype of what we do. Yet when we do this, we forget that there is a person underneath that profession. A person with likes, dislikes, passions, flaws, humour and so much more. When we judge others by what they do, rather than who they are, we all lose. Then, why do we do it? Why do we introduce ourselves with the statement, "And I am so and so and I am a (fill in the blank)"?

This week's parshah addresses the same point. "Isaac loved Esau, for he placed food in his mouth, and Rivka loved Jacob," says the Torah.

When the Torah describes the love Issac has for his son Esau, it is qualified by the statement, "For he placed food in his mouth." Esau, the hunter, captured and prepared food for his father Isaac and brought it to him. The love of Isaac to Esau is qualified by "the placing of food into his mouth." Esau is loved by his father, only as much as his last meal. It is conditional love.

However, in the pasuk regarding Rivka and Jacob, there is no qualifier. Rivka loves her son Jacob. No reason, no qualifier; she just loves him unconditionally.

The Torah tells us, Isaac loved Esau for what he does, Rivka loved Jacob for who he is.

Rivka loves her son – she loves his personality, and she loves his strengths, his weaknesses, his goodness and his flaws. She loves him simply for himself.

This is what I was referring to at the start of this article. We Jews need to care for, recognize each other and be sensitive to each other for who we are, not for what we are. We are not defined by what we do. We are not a plumber, a teacher or a scout leader. That is what we do, not who we are.

We need to teach our children when they are asked the question, "What do you want to be when you grow up?" to not answer what they want to do (accountant, doctor, judge or electrician), but rather, what they want to be a tzaddik, an honest person, a loving person, an accepting person. That is what he or she wants to be. To become an MD, LLD, CA or another wonderful thing is what they want to do, not what they want to be.

How much we lose when we see one another in the single dimension of what we do for a living. How sad it is that we judge others by how successful they are at their professions, rather than how successful they are as people. When the time comes that we can truly see each and every Jew for the multi-faceted, complex personality that he or she is, for sure, the world will be a better place.

Rabbi Avram Rothman, spiritual leader of the Thornhill Community Synagogue.

Intermarriage: a Jewish obsession

By JACK BOTWINIK

Guest Voice

Ever do a Google search on the word "intermarriage"? Nine of the top 10 results are Jewish sites. It's amazing that although Jews constitute one-quarter of one per cent of humanity, it seems intermarriage is exclusively a Jewish concern. Whether it's a new book about intermarriage, an upcoming conference or a resource centre, you can bet that it has to do with Jews marrying gentiles. Most cultures exert pressure to marry one's own kind, but for Jews it seems to be an obsession.

This should not be surprising considering that we Jews have lived as a minority in foreign, and often hostile, environments for most of our history. If it wasn't for our steadfast desire to continue our progeny as Jews, we would have disappeared as a people long ago.

On the other hand, if you look at today's intermarriage figures, you'd think we're anything but obsessed with "Jewish continuity"; in fact, you'd think we've abandoned ship.

One in every two North American Jews marries out.

So, while intermarriage is a Jewish obsession, most Jews don't seem to be obsessed about it. I was no different and dated a Chinese woman.

Let's be honest. Judaism is much more than a religion. Judaism is culture and ethnicity. It is language and geography. It is a collective mindset forged by a particular set of historical experiences. One can quite easily live one's entire life as a Jew guided by these influences. But if one were to strip away these layers, one would discover the core essence of Judaism: our Torah.

While Jewish culture, Jewish languages, Jewish geography and Jewish mindset have evolved and changed, the Torah has remained unchanged. If there is one factor that is of ultimate value, infinitely profound, and uniquely Jewish, it is the Torah. It is the one ingredient without which Judaism could easily, in a matter of a few generations, become unrecognizably transformed or diluted, and eventually vanish in the sea of competing social norms.

While community leaders of all denominations are battling the intermarriage crisis, statistics show that marrying out is lowest among Orthodox Jews, who truly believe the Torah to be the immutable Word of God and their decisive guide in life.

Believing that the Torah is of divine origin has most significant implications for how our daily existence is to be consummated and for our purpose in life. In the absence of this belief, there is no sustainable argument why one (or one's children) should not intermarry.

As was my case, many secular Jews who struggle with intermarriage are walking on thin ice. Their motives for marrying Jewish are tenuous, such as family expectations, which often are overridden once "love" is found. Among often-heard arguments are, "It would kill my parents," "Because of the Holocaust," and "Because of anti-Semitism." These reasons are tainted with guilt and prompt the question, "Why be Jewish?" What is so important about our heritage that we must sacrifice our happiness – refrain from marrying the person we love – for its sake?

All ethnic groups, in trying to curb intermarriage, attempt to instill in their children a greater appreciation of the richness of their heritage. In an increasingly multi-cultural society, this is proving more and more challenging.

For us, such an approach is essential, and we must get to the core. What has preserved our people through the ages is a deep appreciation of Torah combined with an unfaltering conviction that God authored it.

Now, we just need to get more Jews obsessed about Torah.

Jewish Life

Little religious observance among prominent Jews

Books
Bernard Baskin

Stars of David: Prominent Jews Talk About Being Jewish by Abigail Pogrebin, Broadway Books.

It's all a matter of curiosity: how do eminent Jewish personalities feel about Judaism? Actually, they are quite ready to discuss matters of faith and identity. It may have been different a generation or two ago, but today they are comfortable enough in their own skin to deal candidly with a variety of Jewish personal concerns.

The author, a former 60 Minutes TV producer and New York freelance journalist, interviewed 62 Jews from many walks of life. The respondents came from Hollywood (Dustin Hoffman, Steven Spielberg), the Supreme Court (Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer), television (Norman Lear, Aaron Sorkin, William Shatner), journalism (Ellen Goodman, Mike Wallace), fashion (Diane Von Furstenberg, Kenneth Cole), Broadway (Tony Kushner, Neil Simon, Harold Prince), the left and right of politics (Al Franken, Dr. Laura Schlessinger), big business (Edgar Bronfman Jr., Ronald O. Perelman), public law (Eliot Spitzer, Alan Dershowitz) and athletics (Mark Spitz, Shawn Green).

The sit-down, in-depth interviews are consistently entertaining and thought provoking, but they don't bode well for the future of Judaism in America – or at least a Judaism that includes any level of religious observance or more than superficial knowledge. A great number are intermarried and unsure and uneasy about the Jewish continuity of children and grandchildren.

The subject of God rarely comes up in these interviews. Most are passionate about the cultural history, perseverance and values of their faith, but surprisingly few are interested in Jewish theology or involved with organized religion.

Even such a firm advocate of Jewish rights and values as Alan Dershowitz says, "It's very hard. I'm not a cultural Jew and I'm not a spiritual Jew. I'm Jewish the way my friends who are black are black. When I'm in the synagogue, I don't believe a word of it and I'm totally irreligious. When I'm sitting on the beach under the stars in Martha's Vineyard, I get a leap of faith."

Ruth Reichl, former New York Times critic and current Gourmet magazine editor, speaks for some of those interviewed when she bluntly states, "You know what makes Jews Jews? The fact that the world won't let us forget. You can say till the cows get home that you're not a Jew, but the world keeps telling you that you are. And that's what makes you a Jew. What makes a black person black? No matter how white your skin is, if you are a black person, the world keeps reminding me that you're black. Ultimately, it's others' definition of us that makes us Jews."

Pogrebin's most enlightening encounter was with Leon Wieseltier, the literary editor of The New Republic. He objects to the laziness of most of those interviewed and condemns the à la carte Judaism of those who choose what aspect of the religion they like, leave the rest behind and don't bother to learn what they don't know.

Wieseltier's thought had a deep impact on the author. As a result, she began to study Torah, became more involved in her children's religious education and engaged more actively in Jewish ritual practice. At the age of 40, she had her bat mitzvah.

This book, although similar to other interview books, is far better written then most, the questions more probing and many of the answers more wise, considered and enduring.

Jews on the tube, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The new television season is well underway, and viewers and networks have already identified this year's hits and duds. But as TV seasons come and go, some things stay the same: cruise for a while and you are bound to find a handful of Jewish characters sometimes in leading but usually in secondary roles on TV dramas and comedies. Today, Jews on the tube. (One note: As I did research for this column, I was struck by the number of anti-Semitic sites that do not celebrate Jews on TV, but I point to this as further proof of the powerful Jewish cabal.)

Writing in the Guardian, David Herman argues that some of the biggest Jewish stars on television – and in popular culture for that matter – have been "secretly" Jewish. While working in TV, Milton Berle, George Burns, Larry Gelbart and Neil Simon played down their Jewishness because they felt TV audiences weren't ready or wouldn't understand that humour. A famous example was Carl Reiner, who won eight Emmy awards between 1956 and '67. Reiner "based The Dick Van Dyke Show on his own experiences of writing for Sid Caesar [but] had to take out the Jewishness. Instead of Reiner and Caesar, the show had the all-American Dick Van Dyke playing the gentile lead, Robert Petrie. You ended up with a strange kind of cultural ventriloquism, with non-Jewish characters like Marty and Petrie created by Jewish writers who wanted to write about their own experiences but couldn't." [http://tinyurl.com/dj4tg]

But what about contemporary TV writers? Do TV and an openly Jewish lifestyle mix? They do for Ilana Wernick (King of Queens) and Marv Silbermintz (a gag writer on The Tonight Show with Jay Leno). There seems to be more of an acceptance now about being openly Jewish – even by other Jews in the industry. "My bosses are all non-observant Jews, and they've been fantastic about the whole thing," Wernick says. [http://tinyurl.com/cqo9j]

The National Foundation for Jewish Culture wants to promote a positive portrayal of Jews in film and TV while "transcending stereotypes and clichés" and began presenting Jewish Image Awards 2001. While "recognizing the Jewish content of the work, the awards are not based on the religion, race or ethnic identity of the producers." Here are some of the people and programs honoured over the years:

* Female character Hannah Taylor Gordon in Anne Frank (2001)
• Male character Jeffrey Tambor in Arrested Development (2004)
• Episode of The Simpsons – Today I am Clown (2004)
• Series: The West Wing (2001) [www.jewishculture.org/awards/jia]

I have come across the bubbie of all Jewish trivia sites – and I want to share it with you. TV Acres has information about almost 100 television series in which Jewish characters have central (Lanigan's Rabbi) or supporting (L.A. Law) roles. This site is a treasure-trove of trivia. For example, what do the shows Futurama, Babylon 5 and Third Rock from the Sun have in common? They're all science fiction series with characters that have Jewish backgrounds: Dr. John Zoidberg, Lt.-Cmdr. Susan Ivanova and the Solomons. (OK, the Solomons are really aliens but think of themselves as Jewish.) [www.tvacres.com/ethnic_jewish_a_l.htm]

The TV Acres site focuses on American programs, but we shouldn't forget that Canada has had its own shows with Jewish storylines and stars, including Al Waxman's the King of Kensington [www.cjnews.com/pastissues/01/jan25-01/main.asp], and of course, Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster. [http:// tinyurl.com/buudh]

One of the most enduring Jewish characters on TV is the stereotypical Yiddishe mamma. Myrna Hart, of the UCLA Center for the Study of Women, took a close look at TV Jewish mothers and wasn't impressed. She concluded that "the TV Jewish mother is a media archetype whose depictions represent the ambiguity that 21st-century American culture promulgates about the role of mothering… one discovers that, for the most part, she is a devouringly negative, albeit loving presence in her child's life." [http://tinyurl.com/d88dg] (This 24-page study can downloaded in its entirety.)

Next week, more Jews on TV, and the debate over Seinfeld: was it good for the Jews?

Israeli-born Solomon fulfills dream of becoming TV reporter

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Growing up in Israel, Galit Solomon loved to write, and to perform in front of a crowd.

It is only fitting that she combined her passions to become a television news reporter on CTV News in Toronto.

"I knew I really enjoyed writing. I've been writing since I was a kid. I remember being in Israel and writing short stories. I've always kept a journal," Solomon said.

She also described herself as a child who took dance lessons, a high school student who organized talent shows and a university student who wrote plays.

The 29-year-old who lived in Lod, a suburb near Tel Aviv, before she moved to the north end of Toronto when she was 12, worked hard to achieve her dream of becoming a journalist.

She majored in English and mass communications at York University and honed her writing, reporting and editing skills by working as a weekend intern for CFTO News before landing a job with the New VR, now known as the A-Channel.

Today, having been with CTV for a year, Solomon feels she has learned so much from the newsroom veterans who have acted as her mentors.

"I'm lucky because I get to work with people who have been here for a long time, people who I can learn so much from."

Solomon also said that she couldn't imagine herself working a job that required her to be stuck behind a desk all day.

"Aside from the fact that I don't think I'm the kind of person who could enjoy a nine-to-five job, I enjoy the creative element, and I enjoy meeting new people.

"But I think the best part is when you've spent a day or two working on a story and somebody at the end of the day says, 'Oh, I really learned something.' It makes it all worthwhile," Solomon said.

Galit Solomon, CTV News reporter.

As fulfilling as her job is, there is an aspect of being a reporter that, she said, no one likes.

She recalled having to cover a story she'll never forget, one that is etched in the memories of many Torontonians: the abduction and murder of nine-year-old Cecilia Zhang.

"I remember the first time the parents spoke out. It was such an emotional experience," she said.

"But those are difficult stories. I think they are important stories to tell, though."

> "I think the best part is when you've spent a day or two working on a story and somebody at the end of the day says, 'Oh, I really learned something' It makes it all worthwhile"

As difficult as it can be to detach yourself from a story, Solomon said she couldn't think of a story or a challenge that she would shy away from.

She recalled an assignment to report on the reactions of the Jewish and Arab communities in Toronto following the death of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

She said reporters approached her to ask if she had difficulty covering this kind of story.

But Solomon said the thought never crossed her mind.

"Why would it be difficult?" she said.

She credits her upbringing by her parents, who are Indian Jews, her childhood in Israel, and her life in Toronto – one of the most multicultural cities in the world – for her tolerant nature.

"I think growing up, looking ethnic and being Jewish has given me an understanding and respect for other cultures. I think I'm a lot more sensitive to other groups because of that," Solomon said.

"I won't shy away from interviewing someone because I'm worried that they might not speak English well. Well, you know what, we need to reflect that because that's Toronto."

Although it may be easy to get caught up in looking the part of a television reporter and being in front of the camera, Solomon doesn't take for granted the importance of informing the masses.

"We get an opportunity to connect people that otherwise wouldn't be connected. In many ways I'm very grateful that I'm able to do this job."

She said that it is important to maintain a relationship based on trust and credibility with viewers.

"I think we have a big responsibility to people to make sure that they are getting the right information."

She said that she is always pushing herself to do better with each mistake she makes and each lesson she learns.

"I look forward to the moments when I fail. As silly as that sounds, I do look forward to those moments because when that happens, I think about what I'm going to do next time to make it better."

Although Solomon is a driven, ambitious woman, she is happy right where she is, as a reporter for CTV News in Toronto.

"Crafting a story is what I love most."

Analyst examines U.S. foreign policy in Mideast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East was the subject of a recent analysis by an American Pulitzer Prize winner from Harvard University.

In the third Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture of the season at Holy Blossom Temple, journalist and historian Samantha Power also discussed the current war in Iraq and human rights violations in the Darfur region of Sudan.

Power – who was introduced by Margaret MacMillan, the provost of Trinity College at the University of Toronto, as "an extraordinary historian" – said that U.S. special interests often influence American foreign policy.

In the late 1980s, when Iraq was locked in a war with Iran, the United States extended hundreds of millions of dollars worth of farm credits to Baghdad even though Iraq had just gassed Kurds.

Companies with a vested interest in selling Iraq agricultural equipment made the case for advancing the credits to Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime, she noted.

Power, the founding executive director of Harvard's Carr Center for Human Rights Policy, said that most American voters cast their ballots on the basis of domestic rather than foreign policy.

But domestic constituencies can put human rights abuses on the political map by speaking out loudly, she said in a reference to Christian fundamentalist concerns over the situation in Darfur.

Bowing to pressure from vocal Christian groups and human rights organizations, the Bush administration has acted forcefully in Darfur, Power said.

She described this as an example of "bottom up" decision-making.

Power, the author of the acclaimed book A Problem from Hell: America and the Age of Genocide, warned that the African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur is too small to protect the vulnerable non-Arab population from marauding Arab militias.

"It's totally stop-gap rather than meaningful protection."

She warned Washington not to dispatch peacekeepers to Darfur, since they would be a magnet for Jihadist attacks.

Power levelled a scathing critique of the 2003 U.S. and allied invasion of Iraq.

The United States went to war with a shoddy plan and without sufficient troops for nation-building.

And there were no weapons of mass destruction left in Iraq after United Nations inspectors detected, dismantled and destroyed them, she pointed out, dismissing a major component of Washington's regime change policy.

Power suggested that the effort to democratize Iraq should be the only reason for the United States to remain there.

In a plea to policymakers, she called on the United States to integrate itself into what she described as "multilateral frameworks" so that it can cope with transnational threats.

She said the United States now fully recognizes that failed states such as Afghanistan are incubators of terrorism. Saying that President George W. Bush was correct on this issue, Power said there is indeed a direct link between human rights and security.

Israeli immigrant grateful family left Ethiopia

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Nurit Tizazu has lived in Israel for 23 of her 28 years, and has barely any memories of her childhood in Ethiopia and Sudan.

So when she and a cousin went back to visit her family's village in the Tigré region of rural Ethiopia last year, she was happy to be warmly greeted by old family friends but happier still that her family had made the decision to immigrate to Israel.

Some Ethiopians living in Israel are nostalgic about their earlier lives in Africa, Tizazu said. "I heard stories. After visiting Ethiopia, I'm grateful my parents had success to come to Israel and I got a good education."

"The first thing I said was, 'thank God I am in Israel.'"

Tizazu, director of communications and media relations for the Israel Association of Ethiopian Jewry (IAEJ), was in Toronto last week for the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities.

In an interview with The CJN, she described her family's hazardous two-month trek by foot to a refugee camp in Sudan as she, a child of only three or so, was carried in the arms of her grandfather.

After 2½ years in the camp, the family was finally brought to Israel in an airlift.

Going back to the ancestral village of Adishua was something of a revelation for her.

"In Ethiopia, I had western eyes to see things. From how I grew up, I knew I would not want to live that kind of life. The western world has generally a lot to offer children."

By Israeli standards, living conditions for the people in the village were harsh and the opportunities for bettering their lives were minimal, she said. Yet, "I don't feel pity for the people. They live their lives and are happy with their lives."

In Israel, she said, she did something she never would have done had the family remained in Adishua – she graduated from high school. After two years of national service in lieu of army duty, she earned university degrees in public communications and political science and then a master's degree in public management.

Still, Tizazu's story is not one universally held among Ethiopian olim. While more than 3,000 of the 105,000 Ethiopian Israelis have academic degrees and 2,000 attend post high school institutions, the job situation for graduates remains gloomy. In 2003, unemployment for Ethiopian Israelis stood at 26 per cent, compared to 11 per cent for the rest of the population. Those with post secondary degrees are often under-employed. Some observers believe Ethiopians don't have the social network to find jobs in well-paying, established fields.

Israeli society was scandalized at the beginning of the current school year when the mayor of Or Yehuda refused to allow 50 Ethiopian elementary school children to attend classes. The mayor, who was roundly criticized for his action, eventually backtracked and admitted the youngsters. But, he said when he closed the doors to the students, Or Yehuda had a "weak population" and he feared the Ethiopian students would impede the academic level at the school.

Other communities have likewise attempted to limit the number of Ethiopians in their schools.

Responding to the Or Yehuda incident, the Knesset committee on immigration and absorption announced that school policies limiting the number of Ethiopians were unacceptable. It also called on school districts outside traditional Ethiopian communities to enroll a percentage of Ethiopian children each year.

Nurit Tizazu

Tizazu said that while the Israeli government and Diaspora Jewry "did a lot to bring Ethiopians to Israel, aliyah does not end when you bring people to the place. It's also how you help them integrate to life in Israel."

Ethiopians experienced unique problems of adapting to life in Israel because of their different culture and because most did not know how to read or write.

In the early years of settlement in Israel, "many students did not get good marks in 'bagrut' (matriculation exam). [The number of Ethiopian] graduates was very low and we asked, why is that happening?"

Many Ethiopian youngsters were being sent to boarding schools without their parents being consulted. Because they trailed academically their Israeli-born counterparts, some Ethiopian kids were sent to special education classes. "That was insulting to the community" and the IAEJ opposed both policies. Over time, the situation improved, Tizazu said.

On the job front, the IAEJ pushed for affirmative action and about a year ago, the government agreed to give preferences to minority groups in the civil service. It is still too early to determine whether that program is a success, she said.

Referring to the difficulty Ethiopian Israelis have in finding jobs, Tizazu said part of the problem is the reluctance of some Israelis to hire Ethiopians. "There will always be ignorant people who don't like the look of a person and the colour of their skin. But I think Israeli society, mostly, has opinions about Ethiopian community that is formed in the media and you can use the media for bad and for good. Whenever the media covers Ethiopian Jews, it's bad news."

Tizazu said part of the task of the IAEJ is to change that coverage.

Ethiopians are eager to build their community and integrate into Israeli society. "We do not want to separate from the Israeli state. We want to be part of Israel." If the community receives the requisite resources and are employed, both the community and the country will benefit, she said.

The IAEJ is a grass roots organization established in 1994 to advocate and lobby for Ethiopian olim, particularly education and employment.

The organization, which is funded by private donations from a number of foundations, operates in six cities with a staff of 10 along with three volunteers.

Israeli immigrants get a chance to dream

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In an effort to give young Israelis the tools to reach their full potential and help shape the future of Israel, Atidim, a non-profit organization, offers them a gift that lasts a lifetime: an education.

The Atidim Program, a national social-educational program headed by the Israel Defence Forces and funded by philanthropists both in Israel and abroad, aims to give youths the opportunity to get an education and contribute to the ongoing growth, development and progress of Israel.

Atidim, which means futures in Hebrew, reaches out to army conscripts, immigrants and underprivileged youths aged 13 to 30, which constitutes about half the Israeli population, said Shirley Grill, vice-president of Friends of Atidim.

"What we do is give them the tools in order for them to, based on their own merit, reach their full potential," Grill said.

She said the programs are tailored to each age group and community.

Atidim has helped 8,000 people in about 50 Israeli towns, by providing guidance, support, academic scholarships and contacts with industry leaders, Grill said.

She added that none of this would be possible without the help and generosity of Israeli and North American contributors.

Program has helped about 8,000 people

"We are very lucky to have many Israeli volunteers and we also have contributions from the United States [and Canada]," she said.

"There is a very big involvement of the Toronto community in the Atidim program and they were with us from the very beginning."

It is because of the efforts of all who have a hand in the program that Ethiopian immigrants such as Ezra Yevarken and Nitzanet Fareda were able to realize their dreams of creating a meaningful life in Israel, and serve as role models for those who dare to dream of the possibilities.

Born in a small village in Ethiopia, 27-year-old Yevarken immigrated with his parents and six siblings to Israel as part of a military operation that flew Ethiopians into Israel in 1984.

After graduating from high school in 1977, Yevarken joined the army and progressed to lieutenant in the Golani Brigade, which was stationed on Israel's Lebanese border.

After he served his country for four years, Yevarken decided to pursue his dream of getting an education, and worked full-time for a year in hopes of saving enough money for university tuition at Bar Ilan University.

"At home, the economic situation was not so good, and I didn't want to ask my parents to give me money, so I saved all the money that I could through work and I started my first year in university," Yevarken said.

But, he added, he was forced to seek out help from the Jewish Agency, because he still didn't have enough money to cover a full year's tuition.

In his second year of university, Yevarken discovered the Atidim program which granted him a scholarship.

"It was like someone giving you a new future and a new reality," he said.

"They gave me the opportunity to study electrical engineering."

He also said that if it was not for Atidim, he would never have made the contact with the Hewlett-Packard Indigo division, where he works under the mentorship of former Canadian and Indigo founder Benny Landa.

Wanting to give back to the community that provided him with such a bright future, Ezra said he volunteers by tutoring youths in math, grammar and English. But more than a tutor, Yevarken said he is "a brother, a mentor and a friend."

Fareda is another example of someone whose life was changed by Atidim.

As a young girl growing up in Ethiopia, Fareda often dreamed of immigrating to Israel.

When she was 10 years old, Fareda did everything she could to convince her mother to let her go to Israel with her uncle.

It wasn't until four years had passed in Israel that Fareda was told to return home, only to hear devastating news from her mother that her older sister had died giving birth.

Not wanting to abandon her emotionally fragile mother, her brother and nephew, Fareda wrote a letter to the late Israeli president Ezer Weizman, to find a way to bring her family to Israel.

Her wish was granted and Fareda and her family now live in Bet Shemesh.

Her drive to create a life in Israel continued and once she completed high school, Fareda served in the army and taught new immigrants from Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union at a school in Be'er Sheva.

Soon after, Fareda began working for Atidim and developed a program aimed at helping Ethiopian youth, by stressing the importance of education, and most of all, giving them the opportunity to get one.

"I think the Atidim program is very different [from others] and a big thing that happened for our people because it gave us the opportunity for us to change our lives," said Fareda, 24, who has been working for Atidim for four years.

She added that she feels much pride to be a part of the positive change in her community of 104,000 Ethiopians living in Israel.

Until five years ago, Fareda said no one in her community even dreamed that getting an education and becoming a success was even an option.

Yevarken agreed and added that he would not be where he is today without the support system provided by the program.

"People ask me all the time… how I made the change from a simple student in Carmiel to a be an electrical engineer at HP," said Yevarken, who has ambitions to get a master's degree in engineering.

"I tell them that someone believed in me, gave me a push, gave me the economic support, gave me the way to reach the goals I always dreamed of."

Anti-Semitism in Poland now marginal, ex-dissident says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Anti-Semitism in contemporary Poland is a marginal phenomenon, but Poland has failed to adequately deal with its anti-Semitic legacy, a celebrated Polish writer, human rights activist and intellectual charged recently.

"There is no problem between Poles and Jews today. But there is a historical problem," said Adam Michnik, 59, a former Solidarity trade union adviser and current editor-in-chief of Poland's largest daily newspaper, Gazeta Wyborcza, which he co-founded in 1989 as Communism collapsed.

In a recent speech at the University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, Michnik, a former dissident who spent six years in jail from the late 1960s onward for opposing Communist rule, said Poland has not faced up to the fact anti-Semitism was a significant force in the modern era.

Poland's Jewish population before World War II was about 3.3 million, and Poland is now home to an estimated 15,000 Jews. During the Holocaust, the Nazis murdered about 90 per cent of Polish Jewry.

"There is a problem of history, and the key to it is the [Roman Catholic] church," said Michnik, who is half-Jewish.

The church, which plays a dominant role in Poland's education system, could redress this problem, said Michnik, speaking through translator Henry Dasko of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation.

But the church, historically the repository of Polish nationalism, has not accepted this responsibility, noted Michnik, whom Dasko hailed as one of the architects of Poland's peaceful transition from Communism to democracy.

Nevertheless, the church has been unequivocally opposed to anti-Semitism and has condemned it, Michnik acknowledged.

He singled out two prominent Poles who vigorously fought anti-Semitism – Pope John Paul II, who died earlier this year, and Aleksander Kwasniewski, the country's president until recently.

The late pope did more to battle anti-Semitism than any of his predecessors, while Kwasniewski succeeded in removing Poland's stain as an anti-Semitic nation, Michnik claimed.

Anti-Semitism in post-Communist Poland is solely the preserve of the far right and is propagated by certain fringe newspapers and a broadcaster he named as Radio Maria.

In recent years, anti-Semitism has been a yardstick by which to measure one's attitude toward democracy, he explained.

According to Michnik, the status of Jews in post-1945 Communist eastern Europe was, to a large extent, determined by Israel's existence.

Citing the anti-Semitic machinations of the Soviet Union under Joseph Stalin, Michnik referred to the disbanding of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, the arrest and execution of Jewish writers and the infamous Doctors' Plot.

In Czechoslovakia, the Slansky show trial highlighted the anti-Semitic nature of the regime, while in Poland, the state-orchestrated 1968 anti-Zionist campaign also revealed the face of anti-Semitism.

Discussing the period after 1989, Michnik said Poles and Jews were animated by diametrically opposed collective memories.

As an example, he cited the controversy over the presence of a Carmelite convent near the former Auschwitz concentration camp.

For Poles, the convent was an acknowledgement of Jewish suffering, but Jews regarded it as a blatant attempt to Christianize Auschwitz's aura.

Accentuating the positive, Michnik talked briefly about the revival of Jewish culture in present-day Poland.

Books on Jewish history have been and are being printed, and in Warsaw, construction has started on a museum dedicated to the place of Jews in Polish society. Michnik described it as the largest museum project in Europe today.

Meanwhile, ground has been broken for a museum that will commemorate the life and career of Polish-born Yiddish novelist Issac Bashevis Singer.

And in August 2004, the city of Lodz, which was once one-third Jewish, marked the destruction of the wartime ghetto, the last in Nazi-occupied Poland to be liquidated.

Michnik said the Jews of Poland were demonized, isolated and murdered by the Nazis.

"An entire nation disappeared," he said.

He rejected as absurd accusations that Poles participated in the systematic killing of Jews.

Mandelbread — an easy-to-bake treat

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Our grandparents dunked simple mandelbread in a glassel tea. I can still picture my grandfather sitting at the table reading his Yiddish newspaper with his glasses on his forehead rather than on his nose, drinking his tea from a glass, and dunking his mandelbread in it.

But mandelbread is not just a Jewish cookie. Italians call them biscotti, Dutch and South Africans call them rusks, Greeks call them paxemadia, Germans call them zweiback and the Spanish call them carquinyoles. All different names for essentially the same crisp twice-baked cookie.

I love mandelbread. The problem with them however is that because they are often not very sweet and are so crisp, they are perfect for enjoying at any time of the day or evening as an accompaniment to coffee, tea, milk, hot chocolate, even a glass of wine, or just by themselves, and I eat one, then another, then another.... You get the picture.

Coffee is very "big" today. Wherever you turn there are coffee houses, coffee bars and coffee stands. And the one universal thing about them is that they all serve biscotti.

When I was growing up, there was usually only one type of mandelbread, simple ones flecked with almonds. Today there are dozens, if not hundreds of variations on the theme. My grandmother, and probably yours, would have laughed to see how "fancy" they've become.

Most versions are low in both fat and sugar, and some contain no fat at all-except for the almost ever-present nuts. The average calorie count for one is only 45 calories. Basic mandelbread are very simple to make.

They require few ingredients and no special equipment. They are quickly put together and they keep well.

Mandelbread dough can be held in the refrigerator for up to a week. If using refrigerated dough, reduce the oven temperature to 300-325 and add about 5-10 minutes to the baking time or the edges will thin out and spread before the centre gets done. But if your dough is too soft and it spreads all over the pan, just cut it into attractive rectangles about 1½ x 3 in. and twice bake these.

The secret to making perfect mandelbread is not to cream the butter or margarine and sugar too long or you will incorporate too much air into the dough. The secret to cutting them so they don't crumble is to cut them as soon as they're out of the oven with a very sharp knife (using hot pads, of course). But even if you get crumbles, they're a great reward for the cook!

Mandelbread as seen in The Jewish Kitchen

MANDELBREAD

This is the basic mandelbread recipe that I've been using for 40 years. You can also add chocolate chips, any type of nuts, dried cherries, dried apricots, golden raisins, anything your heart desires.

1/2 cup shortening or margarine

1 cup sugar
3 eggs
1 1/4 teaspoon salt
3 cups flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
2 teaspoons vanilla or almond extract
1 cup coarsely chopped nuts

Cream shortening and sugar together until just blended. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each. Add dry ingredients which have been mixed together. Stir in nuts and vanilla. Spread dough into log shaped rolls on greased cookie sheets. Bake at 350 for 30 minutes or until golden brown. Slice logs into ¼ to ½-in. pieces and lay slices on their sides. Toast slices until lightly golden, about 10 minutes on each side. (Makes about 36)

DRIED CRANBERRY AND WHITE CHOCOLATE BISCOTTI

I made hundreds of these for my grandson Moshe's bar mitzvah Kiddush and there wasn't one single one left. They're fabulous! I also sometimes add chopped almonds to the batter.

2 1/2 cups all purpose flour
1 teaspoon baking powder
1/2 teaspoon salt
1 1/2 cups sugar
1/2 cup butter or margarine, room temperature
2 large eggs
1/2 teaspoon almond extract
1 1/2 cups dried cranberries (about 6 ounces)
6 ounces white chocolate chopped, or white chocolate chips
1 egg white

Preheat oven to 350. Line heavy large baking sheet with parchment paper. Combine flour, baking powder and salt in medium bowl; whisk to blend. Using electric mixer, beat sugar, butter, eggs and almond extract in large bowl until well blended. Mix in flour mixture, then dried cranberries and white chocolate. Divide dough in half.

Using floured hands, shape each piece into 2½-in.-wide, 9½-in.-long, 1-in.-high log. Transfer both logs to prepared baking sheet, spacing evenly. Whisk egg white in small bowl until foamy; brush egg white glaze on top and sides of each log.

Bake logs until golden brown (logs will spread), about 35 minutes. Maintain oven temperature. Transfer hot logs to work surface, using oven mitts. Discard parchment. Using a very sharp knife, cut logs on diagonal into ½-in.-wide slices. Arrange slices, cut side down, on same sheet.

Bake 10 minutes; turn biscotti over. Bake until just beginning to color, about 5 minutes. Transfer biscotti to rack. (Makes about 28.)

Peace tour marred by vandalism

VANCOUVER — An unprecedented journey by the representatives of two former enemies now touting peace and prosperity was not without incident last month.

Two large rocks were hurled through a window at Hillel House at the University of British Columbia (UBC) the evening of a Nov. 21 reception at the school's student union building for the Israeli and Jordanian ambassadors to Canada. Police are investigating.

The event itself started more than an hour late as Jewish students argued with Manj Sidhu, vice-president of administration with the Alma Mater Society, UBC's student council, over who could attend, despite an earlier verbal agreement between the society, administration officials and student leaders that half of the 400 seats would be reserved for students.

Eyal Lichtmann, executive director of the Vancouver Hillel Foundation, told The CJN he believes there was a deliberate attempt to "sabotage" the reception, but he praised university officials for how they helped to resolve the dispute.

Lichtmann said it seemed like new restrictions were being imposed on a Jewish event that had not been used for other clubs, and he thinks a "students only" rule was meant to minimize attendance.

In the end, the hall where the two envoys met was only about one-third full, because many students got tired of waiting and left, and the ambassadors were "very upset," he said.

He said the event was a good example of how Jewish students at UBC have been "intimidated" over the past few years. The students have asked the Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress to look into what they say is a pattern.

Speaking to The CJN, AMS officials apologized for what they characterized as a mixup.

AMS president Spencer Keys said that before the event, AMS and the organizers agreed that people who wanted to attend would have to present student cards for security purposes, but he said organizers decided against that practice and the AMS was not aware of the changes.

"At the event, members of the public and students without student cards were turned away at the door. Our staff, and myself, believed we were implementing agreed-to security measures for this event. However, we now know that this was an error," Sidhu said.

"This was a very unfortunate misunderstanding. There was a breakdown of communication [between organizers and the AMS] and for that we take full responsibility," Keys said.

"It is our responsibility to be aware and for that we apologize," Keys added.

The ambassadors, Alan Baker of Israel and Jordan's Nabil Barto, were in Vancouver for a series of public events and discussions to promote peace and trade.

They held a public dialogue at UBC's Liu Institute for Global Issues, and spoke to a select group of business leaders at the Wosk Centre for Dialogue at Simon Fraser University.

At SFU, they also discussed the possibility of exchanging students and faculty between the university and institutions in Jordan and Israel.

The speaking engagements were the brainchild of former B.C. New Democratic Party MLA Bernie Simpson, who also co-chairs Partners in Peace.

In May, Partners in Peace met King Abdullah of Jordan, who gave his support for the initiative. The king and Israeli President Moshe Katsav wrote letters in support of the initiative.

"I think here in Canada it's unusual and unprecedented because I don't think it's happened in the past," Baker told the Globe and Mail.

"The fact that Jordan and its official representative, with the blessing of the king and the government, is so openly and so genuinely appearing together with the Israeli ambassador at public meetings is a message that will go out to the Palestinians and others who have some hesitation sometimes showing themselves on the [main street] with Israel," he said.

The two countries enjoy cordial relations as a result of the 1994 peace agreement. Baker said Jordan uses Israeli airspace and ports to export agricultural produce to Europe.

Trade between the two countries stands at $120 million (US) a year, said Barto. Jordan exports textiles, jewellery, cement, sand and electrical equipment to Israel.

Baker told the online publication Embassy that the relationship is responsible for the growth in trade between the two countries.

"We expect that this will happen also with the Palestinians," he added.

In the Arab world, only Egypt, Jordan and Mauritania have diplomatic ties with Israel.

The speaking engagements were "a strong signal that the government and the people of Jordan are committed to bear the responsibilities as a positive and fair partner to bring peace, security and development to the region," Barto was quoted as saying. "We share these ideas with the Israelis, and people should know about it."

"With peace, we'll have prosperity," he added. "The increase of trade with Canada would improve the situation of the people there. As we all know, poverty breeds extremism and violence, in any country. And prosperity seems to work the opposite way."

Despite the "very stable" relationship with Jordan, "there are still elements in Jordanian society, for instance the union of lawyers and the union of engineers who are pretty hostile to Israel," said Baker.

Howard Stein, co-chair of Partners in Peace, said Canada can play a vital role in encouraging peace between Jordan and Israel through trade.

"You can't expect the U.S. and Europe to play this role," he told Embassy. "There's too much political baggage involved."

The events also brought together some members of the Jewish and Muslim communities in Vancouver.

Stein said Partners in Peace plans to involve the Egyptian ambassador and the Palestinian Authority representative to Canada at a later date.

New Jewish journal celebrates launch at U of T

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The editors of University of Toronto's only independent Jewish student journal celebrated the launch of their first issue last week at U of T's law school.

Notebook: A Discussion of Contemporary Jewish Issues, a journal for Jewish students by Jewish students, will feature four essays, at least one film or book review, a fiction piece, a culture or campus piece, letters to the editor, and an editorial.

Second-year U of T student Brauna Doidge, who is majoring in Jewish studies and minoring in political science and English, got the ball rolling last summer to create an outlet for commentary and debate relating to Jewish issues.

"In the summer, I found out about a grant, the Azure Student Journals Project, to fund student journals on campus, and I thought this would be a perfect opportunity for me because J've always been interested in journalism and writing," Doidge said.

She said the first person she called was Alex Green, a fourth-year student majoring in political science and Jewish studies because she felt he'd be a perfect fit as Notebook's executive editor.

After being awarded the Azure grant, as well as a grant from Hillel of Greater Toronto, that covers the $3,000 it costs to produce each issue, Green and Doidge got to work producing a journal they hoped would engage Jewish students in intellectual discussions.

"There are, according to Hillel, about 3,000 Jews on campus, and I just thought there should be a publication of this kind on campus," Doidge said.

According to their mission statement, "Jewish scholars throughout the ages called their books of commentary on the ancient texts that shaped their world kuntres, meaning notebook.

"In the same spirit of serious study and thought, students are invited to take the opportunity to both think critically about the underlying issues that influence their world and express their thoughts on these subjects with the hope of advancing further serious reflection."

Doidge said the format of the journal is interesting for both the contributors and the readers because it gives the writers the opportunity to deeply explore an issue of interest, while informing others.

She hopes that the academic format will be embraced as an alternative to other kinds of Jewish publications like Heeb Magazine, which pokes fun at Jewish issues.

Doidge said that as an editor, she wants to reach out to as many writers as she can.

"We're not going to turn anyone away," she said. "We'll try to print everything that comes in, even if it requires a lot of work."

And the journal is a reflection of that. With topics that range anywhere from the issue of the Diaspora and Zionism to a review of the comedy film The Hebrew Hammer, the aim of the editors is to appeal to Jewish students regardless of their interests.

CFJS delegates attend conference in Israel

By ROBERT METH
Special to The CJN

The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), with assistance from National Jewish Campus Life, recently sent three delegates to Israel to attend an international students' conference recently.

The conference, "Dialogue in Action," was hosted by the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) and supported by UNESCO. Its purpose was to encourage dialogue between Jewish and non-Jewish students from around the world.

At the conference, which took place in Jerusalem from Nov. 13 to 16, students from Great Britain, Italy, Turkey, Sweden, the Netherlands and Germany discussed topics such as coexistence, interfaith dialogue and conflict resolution.

The conference's aim was to establish an active global coalition of student leaders that will act for the promotion of conflict resolution and democracy around the world.

The Canadian delegation, the only North American group, included Samuel Zeev Konig of McGill University, Elias Parker of the University of Western Ontario and Jerad Gallinger of Dalhousie University.

The students spent three days in Israel participating in discussions and forums, providing a Canadian approach and perspective to issues facing students on university campuses.

The conference was also an opportunity for students from around the world to visit Israel and experience its beauty and culture.

Conference delegates spent time at the Givat Haviva Institute outside of Hadera, an educational foundation that works to create a greater understanding between different groups in Israeli society and other nations.

Student delegates met with the adviser to the minister of Israeli Society and the World Jewish Community, Rabbi Gideon Sylvester, and the retired director general of the Jerusalem International YMCA, Rizek Abusharr.

WUJS chair Viktoria Dolburd said that "we hope that we established ways for these different people to communicate and look forward to the actions to follow.

"Gathering students from different nations and political views to the first international student conference in Israel was a great honour for Israel."

A steering committee was set up to plan for the next conference, which Konig said, will "hopefully be held in Canada.

"We'll be able to continue our dialogue while at the same time showing others the beauty of the multicultural and multi-ethnic society that we live in here in Canada."

Teenage girl charged with vandalizing Belleville shul

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A 17-year-old girl has been arrested and charged with mischief to religious property for allegedly spray-painting swastikas on the Sons of Jacob synagogue in Belleville, Ont., in late October.

According to Belleville Police, graffiti was spray-painted on each side of the building, as well as on windows and a mailbox, but synagogue president Joe Burke said he only knew of swastikas painted on the back wall of the shul and on some windows.

Burke said the swastikas were discovered in the first week of November by a group of women who were going to a service at the shul.

A Belleville Police spokesperson said the accused, who cannot be identified under the Young Offenders Act, was arrested on Nov. 17 after an investigation.

She was charged with mischief to religious property and will stand trial on Jan. 17.

Burke said he had yet to meet with his 20-person congregation since the teen was arrested, but said the people he has spoken with "were all shocked."

"We were deeply concerned and we just hope these things won't happen again," he said.

He added that it was an isolated incident for Belleville's Jewish community.

"I'm not happy with what happened. But there is anti-Semitism all over the world, and we've been fortunate that we haven't had too many incidents," Burke said.

Len Rudner, Canadian Jewish Congress' director of community relations, said such incidents are rare in small communities, but it's important for victims to report them so that police can conduct a proper investigation.

"In this situation, the Belleville Police were on this very quickly. The matter is proceeding and the community seems to be very pleased," Rudner said.

"I think they did a good job," Burke said, adding that Det. Tim Soster, who led the investigation, was scheduled to address the congregation this past Sunday about any concerns members of the Jewish community have.

"No matter what the situation, [anti-Semitic acts are] always unwelcome and it's always the last thing we want," Rudner said.

He added that vandalism "is not a unique experience" and that unfortunately, it has become a part of "an ongoing corrosive drip" in Canada.

Burke said he has been pleased with the support he's received from the non-Jewish community.

"We had a lot of calls from the Christian community who expressed concern to the Jewish community, and they recognized how bad things can be," he said.

Family fleeing Katrina returns to Vancouver

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Jeff Hoffman and his family moved to New Orleans from Vancouver last year because his career as a cameraman in the film industry took him there.

The Hoffmans arrived in New Orleans in November 2004, rented a bungalow, unpacked and settled down. Then in late August they heard Hurricane Katrina was on the way.

"We have a strong survival instinct," says Hoffman, a Reform Jew who grew up in Marblehead, Mass. "I started planning our evacuation route immediately."

Noticing that other evacuees were heading west in bumper-to-bumper traffic, Hoffman determined he'd steer north through Mississippi. "I thought we'd keep going till we hit safety or Canada," he says.

Taking both family cars, their two-year-old daughter and their dog, the Hoffmans left at midnight the Saturday before Katrina hit New Orleans, on Monday, Aug. 29. At 6 a.m., they found a motel room in Jackson, Miss., but could only stay overnight as the hotel was overbooked with other evacuees. "We got up at 4 a.m. the next morning and drove west, which turned out to be a wise decision as Jackson had a great deal of damage when the hurricane's winds hit there a day later," says Hoffman.

Jeff and Beth Hoffman with their daughter

The next day on television they watched the devastation hit their home city and saw the levees break from the safety of a motel in Shreveport, La. "Our house was just a few blocks away from the levees, and it was soon underwater," says Beth Hoffman.

"From the aerial photos on the Internet, we confirmed that we could see house roofs, but not much else. The main street, a block away from our home, was under eight feet of brackish water from the lake. The power was out, the sewers were backed up and there was no communication for days. Since we'd made it out okay, we decided to come back to Vancouver."

Luckily for the family, they are dual citizens, and as a result, had no problem returning to Canada to re-establish their lives. They arrived with the same things they left with: a couple of backpacks, the cars, and their family intact. A friend lent them a basement suite until they could find permanent housing. As the weeks tick by, they are slowly rebuilding, grateful for the generosity shown by those around them and still stunned by their narrow escape and the devastation wreaked by Hurricane Katrina.

When Beth returned to New Orleans last month, she knew to expect the worst but was nonetheless shocked by the state of her home. Subjected to flooding by contaminated water containing chemicals and raw sewage, her family's personal possessions were ruined and the furniture was history.

The Hoffmans estimate they lost $60,000 worth of personal possessions in the hurricane. They are still battling with insurance companies to reclaim some of their losses, but of the million residents displaced by Katrina, they are among the lucky ones.

"We are really just looking for the opportunity to become self-reliant again and reclaim some sense of normalcy in our lives," says Jeff Hoffman.

Montreal to send large group to March of the Living

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal once again will be sending the largest single-city delegation in the world on the March of the Living trip to Poland and Israel next year.

The total number of participants on the March, which takes place just after Passover, from April 23 to May 7, 2006, will be upward of 500, said Derrick Nishmas, who is co-chairing the March with Howard Stotland.

That includes 250 to 300 Grade 11 students – the March's main target group – as well as 50 or so young adults, from 20 to 35 years old, and roughly 100 adults.

Add on the support contingent – madrichim, survivors, rabbis, educators and even physicians – and the total climbs to about 500.

"Hopefully, we'll be in the front row of the March again," Nishmas said. "There's a real buzz about this trip – how magical, how special it is."

The trip is organized from the offices of the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre under the umbrella of the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre.

The expected number to go on the 2006 trip is staggering since it was thought it would be tough to top the Grade 11 numbers from last year – 209. That trip, which was chaired locally by Jeff Mandel, coincided with the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II in Europe. Close to 20,000 people from around the world assembled at Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp on Holocaust Memorial Day. About half that number are expected to participate internationally next year.

Most participating Jewish students will be from Jewish schools, but some as well come from non-Jewish private and public schools. In Montreal, registration closed on Nov. 11.

Nishmas, 50, who served as a madrich on the two previous marches, said there is something unique about the local Jewish community that lures so many to the March.

"I think it's a reflection of our level of commitment to Jewish education and of these kids' parents," he said.

How will 2006 be different? Nishmas said there would be a concerted effort "to strengthen the educational component" in Israel, while other parts of the trip that have worked will remain in place.

"The important thing is to have the right leadership, the right madrichim and the right program," he said. "Next year I think we really have the crème de la crème."

The process of preparing next year's March started in late summer of this year, when the call was put out for the next batch of madrichim. The final group of 24 – three for each of the eight buses – was finalized after Yom Kippur, and on Oct. 27 the first information session was held for participants. The lead-up to the March also involves innumerable meetings, two pre-trip Shabbatons for participants and more information sessions. The logistics, Nishmas suggested, are complex, but a working critical path is in place despite the inevitable, unforeseeable hitches and glitches.

Unlike in earlier years, student participants are no longer screened through individual interviews to ensure they are psychologically prepared to handle the trauma of being in Holocaust death camps, but Nishmas said that teachers are asked to raise a red flag if they feel a particular student might not be suited to go.

For Nishmas, who has been to Israel six times over the last eight years, it's the kids who inevitably teach the adults what the March is all about. "They are my best teachers. Sharing the experience with them makes every second worthwhile."

He said the power of the March lies "in the fact that we will never forget or let it happen again, but also that we now stand as free Jews."

Nishmas remembered returning from his first March experience devastated. But that changed, he said, on his second March when he saw a survivor and his grandson together at a death camp in Poland as "free and proud Jews," as people who ultimately prevailed over those who sought their destruction.

At the Western Wall on the same trip, Nishmas felt as if he could "hear the sounds of the six million rejoicing as they were at the Wall praying as free Jews in our own homeland."

Westmount elects first Jewish mayor

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Only a generation ago, a Jewish mayor of Westmount would have caused more than a few raised eyebrows. When Allen Nutik ran unsuccessfully for mayor in 1983 against incumbent Brian Gallery, he was considered a maverick.

Karin Marks' election last month as the first Jewish mayor of Westmount in its 131-year history has gone largely unnoticed. Marks, who takes office Jan.1, does not make a point of her Jewishness, and insists it was never an issue in her campaign, either in her favour or against.

"It was never my intention or goal to become mayor. I look upon it as community service, not a job," she said.

Marks, a councillor since 1991, won almost 90 per cent of the votes against opponent Gerald Glass – also Jewish – who was never considered to have a serious chance. Marks has been chair – later renamed mayor of the borough of Westmount – since the 2001 merger with Montreal, which she strongly opposed. She is now about to take over the leadership of the newly reconstituted city and its $48-million budget.

The turnout, however, was only 25 per cent, and seven of the eight council seats were acclaimed. Nutik, attempting a comeback, lost to John de Castell.

Iranian organization hosts exhibition in support of Israel

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Iranian Unity Council (VIUC), which opposes the present Iranian government, recently hosted an exhibit of photographs and articles in support of Israel on the steps of the Vancouver Art Gallery.

"The purpose was to tell passersby about the human rights practices of the Iranian regime, something the mass-media often misses, as well to tell them about the glorious history that Iranians and Jews have shared," said Majid J., the public relations officer for VIUC. (Majid J. wishes to remain anonymous as he has family living in Iran.)

The pedestrians who stopped to read the articles and look at the photos were "stunned and moved," said Majid J., to find out about "the age-old relationship between Iranians and Jews."

"We wanted to refute the idea that the average Iranian hates Jews. It's not true. The problem is the government."

At one time, there were 250,000 Jews in Iran. Even today, there are still 150,000 Jews in Iran, mostly clustered in the cities of Shiraz and Esfehan. Majid J. said Jews have been living in Esfehan for 2,500 years.

The VIUC is planning to take the exhibit to other venues in the Lower Mainland.

"We want to get the attention of more Jews living in British Columbia, and to impress upon them the dangers presented by the Iranian regime," said Majid J.

He said the overwhelming majority of Iranians living in Canada oppose "the 26-year terrorist Islamist regime in Iran."

However, many elite members of the regime's financial and security apparatus have set up hideouts in Canada in case "something happens" in Iran and they have to leave the country in a hurry, Majid J. said.

"In the past, the bad guys had their hideouts in Argentina. But after the attacks on Jewish communal organizations in Buenos Aires, they were pressured by the Argentinian government to get out of the country. The bad guys then changed their choice of hideout from South America to Canada."

Majid J. said Iranian government "agents and assassins" come and go between Canada and Iran "all the time" and "they present a very serious threat to Canada's national security."

The Vancouver Iranian Unity Council (VIUC), which was formed in 2003, supports democratic regime change in Iran. There are similar organizations in every major city in Canada and in other cities around the world.

Majid J. said there are at least 35,000 to 40,000 Iranians in British Columbia's Lower Mainland. Most Iranians living in Canada have settled in the Greater Toronto Area, where there are approximately 150,000. In addition to clusters of Iranians in Montreal and Ottawa, there are pockets scattered across Canada.

VIUC generally attracts more than 100 participants to its meetings, Majid J. said.

In addition to holding meetings for its members, the VIUC also hosts gatherings to educate Canadians about the Iranian regime.

Female rabbinical student heads Conservative shul

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — In what is believed to be a first for Ontario, a Conservative shul in Hamilton has chosen a woman as its spiritual leader.

Julia Andelman, a fifth-year rabbinical student at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, has recently been hired by Beth Jacob Congregation as its part-time spiritual leader for the year. She replaces Rabbi Mark Biller, who left recently after six years with Beth Jacob for a pulpit in New Jersey.

Andelman was born and raised in the Boston area and earned a bachelor's degree in visual arts from Harvard University, where she also became involved in Hillel leadership. There she met many Orthodox students who had studied in yeshiva in Israel before university.

Inspired by their knowledge, she decided to study at the Conservative Yeshiva in Jerusalem after she finished her degree.

"I knew how to live an observant Jewish life, more or less," Andelman explained, "but I wanted a deeper understanding of the textual sources behind those practices."

Although she had planned to stay in Israel for just one year, she so enjoyed Torah lishmah – learning for its own sake, for spiritual and intellectual growth rather than for a degree or qualification – that she remained at the Conservative Yeshiva for three years.

Because of her positive learning experience in Israel, Andelman ultimately decided to pursue a career in the rabbinate.

Nearing the completion of that training, Andelman was eager to build on her practical rabbinic experience through a student pulpit.

Andelman flies in from New York once a month and remains in Hamilton from Friday afternoon to Sunday morning. She leads services on Friday night and Shabbat morning, and facilitates study sessions on Saturday afternoon and Sunday morning. The weekend visits also include Friday night congregational dinners and other programs.

She said she was drawn to Beth Jacob because she felt that the community's diverse needs would challenge her to become a better rabbi, especially because the synagogue is going through a period of change.

An important goal for the congregation this year is to make services more meaningful, both for regular attendees and for people who have had trouble finding inspiration from synagogue life.

Andelman sees music as a crucial vehicle for accomplishing this goal, and she brings significant experience in that area. She is a well-known shlichat tzibur (prayer leader) in New York and has produced a CD of Jewish prayer melodies.

Andelman plans to lead Carlebach-style Friday night services, filled with easy, beautiful and repetitive melodies designed to make the service accessible and joyful even for those who don't know the words.

"It seemed that the community was looking for much more than just someone to lead services," Andelman explained when asked why she chose Beth Jacob over other student pulpits.

She added that the job also presented a unique opportunity for her to learn about and contribute to the Canadian Jewish community.

Speaking after her first Friday night at Beth Jacob, Andelman said she felt a mood of real communal celebration and that there was a lot of excitement and enthusiasm about building on that experience.

Although she is the first woman to lead Beth Jacob, Andelman said she has felt fully accepted and respected by the community and has not sensed any ambivalence because of her gender.

In fact, she said she suspects that being a woman makes her more interesting to the congregation.

Andelman predicts that the Conservative movement will be fully egalitarian in the not-too-distant future, noting there are fewer and fewer Conservative synagogues in which women do not participate equally.

Psychologist divides time between Hamilton and Israel

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Mary Blum Devor is a woman of warmth, humour and understanding who speaks directly to you with keen interest and empathy.

But her warmth and compassion alone would not have made her a clinical psychologist whose services are in demand in two countries.

Speaking to a breakfast club meeting at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom on Nov. 20, Blum Devor told the fascinating story of her intertwined personal and professional lives.

Her interest in helping people began when she was 15 years old. As part of a high school project, she was visiting a day-care centre, where she noticed some emotionally disturbed children. Her interest was piqued.

"It intrigued me right from the beginning," the Toronto native says. "I knew right from that age that I would help people when I grew up."

Some 64 years later, Blum Devor is still helping people.

She parlayed that intense interest into a master's degree in psychology at the University of Toronto, then a distinguished career as chief psychologist of the Hamilton Mental Health Clinic for Children and Adolescents, as well as a lecturer in the department of psychiatry at McMaster University's medical school and head of family therapy at the Children's Clinic of the Ezrath Nashim Community Health Centre in Jerusalem (a part of Herzog Hospital's outpatient department).

Her career continues as she carries on a busy private practice both in Israel, where she spends three months of each year, and Hamilton.

Mary Blum Devor

Her first marriage brought her to Hamilton, where her husband, Sidney Blum, found work as research director of the Hamilton Social Planning Council. Her career was put on hold for 10 years as she raised five children.

"I was really dying to have a career, but I took the 10 years to focus on being a good mother," she says proudly.

Unfortunately, Sidney Blum died in in 1969 when a serious case of colitis developed into colon cancer.

"It was very hard after he died," Blum Devor recalls, the pain still evident.

"I was heartbroken, because up until then I was very happy, and suddenly I was faced with grief and sadness."

But her burgeoning career was good therapy for the young widow, who took on the sole responsibility for raising her young family.

Beside her work at the Hamilton Mental Health Clinic for Children and Adolescents, where she soon became director, she was deeply involved in many parts of Hamilton's community life, resulting in a nomination for Hamilton's Woman of the Year in 1978.

Burgeoning career was good therapy

"I was actually married to my work, and I had no intention of getting married again," she says.

But a trip to Israel in the late 1970s led to her re-acquaintance with Berko Devor, a former Toronto lawyer.

Love blossomed, and they married in 1979. Devor had lived in Israel for 10 years, and they decided to live there together.

"I loved my home, where I felt secure, I loved my job, my family and my friends, and it was really very hard to leave. But I psyched myself up for a new adventure."

In Israel, Blum Devor went to an ulpan to learn Hebrew. She also volunteered to teach at Hebrew University and developed a course in child development and family therapy that became very popular. Then she volunteered at a children's clinic in Jerusalem, where she trained the staff in family therapy and supervised students.

After a while, she started a private practice, and the money she earned was donated to the children's clinic of Ezrath Nashim. She still donates all the money that she earns from her private practice in Israel to that clinic.

"Clients write their cheques directly to Ezrath Nashim," she says. "They feel so good that they're giving tzedakah instead of paying a therapist."

Devor became involved in her practice, originally as a translator, then as an enthusiastic co-therapist. Orthodox men, who are sometimes ill-at-ease when alone with a woman, felt more relaxed with him involved, Blum Devor says

Blum Devor returned to live in Canada with her husband in 1990 when he became ill with cancer. Devor died in 1993.

But Blum Devor returns to Israel for three months each year and continues to practice in both Jerusalem and Hamilton.

And since the needs of her clients often overlap with her travels, she has developed a technique for doing psychotherapy by telephone.

Only Sharon can make peace, Mubarak says

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BARCELONA — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is the only Israeli politician capable of reaching peace with the Palestinians, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said in an interview published in Spain last weekend.

Mubarak's remarks came only days after Sharon quit the Likud party, saying he could not push for peace with the Palestinians while wasting time battling ideological rivals.

"Sharon, of all the Israeli politicians, is the only one capable of achieving peace with the Palestinians," Mubarak said in an interview with Spain's ABC newspaper. "He has the ability to take difficult decisions, commit to what he says and carry it out."

Mubarak pointed to Sharon's success in pushing through Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip despite opposition from settlers and from within Likud.

"I think Sharon is serious in his efforts to achieve peace. The recent progress in Israel confirms this. He has left his own party to build another, more centrist one, driven by his discontent with the rigid attitudes of his party on the peace process," Mubarak said.

He made the comments as a number of leaders were arriving in Barcelona for a summit marking the 10th anniversary of the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership, which unites the EU and 10 Near Eastern and North African neighbours.

Mubarak could not attend the summit, which is the only multilateral forum where Israelis and Palestinians meet regularly to discuss co-operation.

At a rare bilateral meeting Sunday at the summit, Israel's Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert urged Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to disarm Hamas, an Israeli official said.

Meeting a day after the opening of the first Palestinian-controlled border crossing between Gaza and Egypt at Rafah, supervised by EU monitors, Olmert and Abbas also agreed to look at ways of increasing economic co-operation.

"Olmert wished Mahmoud Abbas luck in the forthcoming elections of the Palestinian Council," the official said, referring to parliamentary polls next month.

"At the same time, he stressed that Israel sees a danger in the participation of Hamas [in the election]."

Hamas is the main Palestinian opposition group in the election, but has been placed on a proscribed terrorist list by the EU and the United States.

The official quoted Olmert as saying: "Hamas does not support peace and they are a threat to peace and the Palestinians themselves," adding that "terrorism" is the main obstacle to improved ties between Israel and the PA.

"You know this yourself," he quoted Olmert as telling Abbas, adding that disarming Hamas was primarily in Palestinian interests.

Abbas has held talks to persuade Hamas and the smaller Palestinian Islamic Jihad terror group to stop attacks on Israel, a truce that has mostly held since Israel left Gaza in the summer.

The Rafah border crossing reopened Saturday at the instigation of Sharon, who did not attend the Barcelona summit.

Earlier, Abbas gave a joint news conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, whose country holds the EU presidency, and top EU leaders, in a sign of the bloc's desire to develop ties with the Palestinian leadership and build its role in the Middle East peace process.

Olmert is due to meet Palestinian Finance Minister Salam Fayyad this weekend in London, where both will be speaking to the G8 group of nations at the invitation of Gordon Brown, Britain's finance minister, the Israeli official said.

Police seek families of WWII Stuttgart mass grave victims

By JONATHAN LIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israeli police estimated Sunday that the families of 20 inmates from a Nazi-era forced labour camp, located in a suburb of Stuttgart, now live in Israel.

This preliminary estimate is based on evidence collected in an investigation of a mass grave uncovered two months ago during construction work at a U.S. Army airport in the town of Echterdingen. German authorities believe the 34 skeletons that were found are the remains of victims of the labour camp, which operated there for two months.

Israeli police are approaching possible relatives in Israel, seeking DNA samples to compare to genetic material from the remains.

The investigation is being handled by Israel's liaison officer with Interpol, Asher Ben Artzi, after German police asked for assistance both with identifying the victims and locating potential living relatives in Israel.

On Sunday, Ben Artzi – who has also handled a two-year hunt for three key Nazi criminals hiding in Australia, Spain and Brazil – was able, with the help of the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial authority, to locate one of the camp's sole survivors. He spoke by phone with the 85-year-old resident of the Netherlands in an attempt to gather details that will help identify the bodies.

The survivor, whose identity the police have asked to keep confidential, told them he is unable to help.

"I did not know inmates at the camp by name. We were just numbers. At most I knew a few first names," he told investigators Sunday.

The man was thus unable to shed light on the camp's inmates, either those who died or those who survived. Nonetheless, Israeli police plan to suggest that German investigators collect testimony from him.

"I hope he will be able to add something about the things that happened at the camp," Ben Artzi said.

The mass grave was uncovered in September during construction work at the U.S. military base, located at the airport that serves Stuttgart. Workers digging there discovered skeletons and quickly called local police, who found the remains of 34 bodies during their search.

Construction was halted immediately. The investigation was classified a multiple-victim homicide and efforts were undertaken to identify the victims. German police then determined that the mass grave probably dated back to the time of World War II.

The head of Israel's ZAKA emergency rescue and recovery organization, Yehuda Meshi Zahav, announced Sunday that he had approached German authorities, asking that DNA sampling not be performed on the skeletons, as it would dishonour the dead.

Meshi Zahav said his organization appealed to the Rabbinical Center of Europe and the Stuttgart chief rabbi, as well as the German president's office.

"The rabbis say this is contempt for the honour of the dead. It is prohibited to touch the bones of the dead. Taking DNA samples from the skeletons involves crumbling bones into dust. There is no allowances in Jewish law for such procedures," Meshi Zahav told Ha'aretz.

Jews mixed on new Polish leader

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — The new president of Poland was elected with the backing of anti-Semitic supporters.

But not all Polish Jewish officials believe that Lech Kaczynski, who takes office this month, should be criticized for his extremist bedfellows.

Kaczynski, the former mayor of Warsaw, was elected in October, narrowly defeating outgoing President Aleksander Kwasniewski, who is popular with Jews inside and outside Poland.

The Catholic-oriented Law and Justice Party of the incoming president governs Poland in coalition with two extremist parties, Self-Defense and the League of Polish Families (LPF), "whose members have frequently expressed anti-Semitic sentiments," according to Tel Aviv University's Stephen Roth Institute, which monitors national attitudes toward Jews all over the world.

When he became mayor of Warsaw in 2002, Kaczynski accepted the demand of the LPF to build a monument to Roman Dmowski in the city centre, according to the Stephen Roth Institute.

Dmowski was the chief ideologue of the nationalist anti-Semitic movement Endecja in the 1920s and '30s.

In addition, the LPF is closely connected to Radio Maryja, a station that openly espouses anti-Semitism and is popular among conservative Catholics who have rejected Pope John Paul II's message of love and reconciliation toward the Jewish people.

Andrzej Lepper, the leader of Self-Defense, has repeatedly made enthusiastic references to Goebbel's "propaganda skills" and Hitler's "economic policy," according to the Stephen Roth Institute.

But some Jewish officials in Poland say they have no reason to believe Kaczynski will be unfair toward the Jewish community, which numbers an estimated 8,000.

"President Kaczynski in all of his dealings has been forthcoming, fair and respective of the needs of local Jews and their role in Poland. Any rumours about him being anti-Semitic are unfair. I think he will actually be a very strong ally against anti-Semitism," said Poland's chief rabbi, Michael Schudrich, who has lived in the country for more than a decade.

The rabbi interacted with Kaczynski when the latter was the minister of justice, responsible for investigating the case of Jedwabne, where hundreds of Jews were massacred in 1941 by fellow Polish townspeople.

The case was hushed up until a book published in 2000 put the blame squarely on the residents, not on the Nazis.

As the minister in charge of the case, Kaczynski had the unenviable job of organizing the exhumation of victims' bodies, which is against Jewish law. He eventually reached an agreement with Jewish leaders in which the dead were not disturbed.

"I met with him several times and he was a man of his word, even though he had far more reason to placate the rightists than to stick to Jewish law," Rabbi Schudrich said.

Kataryna Ober, a member of the Polish Union of Jewish Students, is bothered more by what she believes to be the incoming president's homophobia.

"He is against gays. Gays are different. So why not Gypsies and Jews as well? I think we should all be afraid of him," said Ober, 19.

It has not escaped Ober's attention that some of the fringe groups known for their anti-Jewish statements, such as the All-Polish Youth, are also the most active opponents to gays in Poland, often resorting to violence.

Ober recalls when Kaczynski, then the mayor of Warsaw, prevented a gay rights group from marching last year, but then allowed a "march of the normal" – made up of anti-gay groups – to proceed.

The Polish Union of Jewish Students formally protested the mayor's action.

Ober admitted, however, that Kaczynski has vowed to continue strong political and commercial co-operation with Israel.

Stanislaw Krajewski, co-chairman for the Council of Christians and Jews, took a wait-and-see attitude.

"I hope this man, the president, will keep up the work of the last president," he said.

Kwasniewski was held in high esteem by Jews because of his warmth toward Israel and because of his willingness to admit that Poles had their share of guilt when it came to wartime atrocities against Jews.

Call to EU to fight anti-Semitism

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — Jewish groups met with senior European Union officials last weekend, urging them to take the lead in fighting anti-Semitism and agree on a common definition of anti-Semitism.

The meeting came after the union's racism monitoring agency released a racism and xenophobia report, calling the EU governments' 2004 record of fighting racism and xenophobia mixed, at best.

The Vienna-based agency's director, Beate Winkler, said there was a marked increase in anti-Semitic incidents in France in 2004 and linked recent unrest in the suburbs of French cities to a lack of job opportunities for immigrant families.

The report covers 2004 – a year in which there was a terrorist attack on commuter trains in Madrid that killed some 200 people and the Islam-critical Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh was killed on an Amsterdam street. "After van Gogh, we have seen a big increase in islamophobia in Holland and other European countries," Winkler said.

The report said British police received almost 53,000 reports of racist incidents in 2004. Germany was second with 6,474 reports.

Canadian final choice in Israeli 'Bachelor' show

After several auditions, she was finally offered a part on the show. It was not an easy decision. "It meant taking a semester off from school, which my parents weren't thrilled about," says Anbar. She had other reservations, too. "I was suspicious of joining a reality show to begin with – from what I knew of reality TV, it was really trashy television. But it was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

In the end, she decided to take the plunge. And what a plunge! Before she knew it, Anbar became the busiest and most popular person in Tel Aviv. "My friends in Toronto couldn't believe it. To go from living alone in Tel Aviv, to having everyone know you, is an amazing feeling," says Anbar, who recalls that after the first episode aired, she went to the corner store to pick up ice cream in her pajamas and was shocked to discover the vast number of strangers who recognized her.

"It was crazy! It caught me off guard at first. I think because it's reality TV, people who watch the show think they know you, personally. And everyone in Israel has an opinion. So, even now, I am constantly being stopped on the street. It's like everyone in Tel Aviv has become my friends and family."

Being on the show was an off-the-wall experience, as well. "For the most part, I really enjoyed it and thought it was really fun," says Anbar.

"There were, of course, girls on the show that I liked more and girls that I liked less. But this was not your typical reality TV show. It was classy. It was romantic. There was nothing catty between the girls, and nothing sleazy between Ari and the girls. I made a lot of friends."

Anbar says when it came down to five finalists, it got tougher. "When it came down to the end, I think we all came to the consensus that it was difficult, but that he had established separate relationships with each of us. It was tough, but we never took it out on each other."

The toughest part for Anbar was when the competition was reduced to two: her and Neta, a blond who grew up on a moshav in the north of Israel. "The confidence that I had at the beginning of the show was shaken at this point," says Anbar, who adds that she was affected by the condemnation of the Hebrew press, which questioned the rationale behind holding the show in Israel, if it meant assisting in the hook-up of an American and a Canadian Jew.

"I got a lot of mixed messages at the end, and in some ways, the production itself seemed to favour Neta," she says. "They kind of typecast me as the Canadian and used it against me, as in 'the Israeli versus the Canadian' and I don't think that was fair.

"I don't think of myself as completely Canadian. I don't think anyone in Canada feels completely Canadian. In Canada, I am Israeli. In Israel, I am Canadian. I have always considered myself a hybrid of the two."

In the end, Goldman chose Anbar. "I won't say that our common background didn't help our relationship. We share a common language and culture," she says.

"Still, he could have just as easily clicked best with an Israeli. It's purely an issue of compatibility."

Anbar said she knew they were compatible from the start. "There was definite click, definite chemistry," she says. "The show led us to each other."

Still, the relationship didn't really develop much on air. "It's not really reality, with the cameras following you all the time," she says. That's not to say that it didn't develop all. Anbar recalls one date with Goldman in which the two of them dressed up in costumes and ran amok in an amusement park, playing on the bumper cars and riding the ferris wheel. "It was really fun," she says. "It was the first time we had a private date and we really became closer with each other."

Now that they're a couple, Anbar thinks the relationship will have a much greater chance to develop. "After the show was our first week of actual dating and getting to know each other," she says, adding that although Goldman returned to New York and she is still in Tel Aviv, they talk on the phone at least once a day, and have plans to visit each other in the near future. "For now, we will divide our time between Israel, New York and Toronto.

"Neither of us knows if the relationship is built to last yet," she says. "But I think we owe it to each other to give it a chance, since it was such a big leap of faith for him to come to Israel, and he chose me."

Although neither can anticipate what the future holds, Anbar is confidant that any future plans will involve Israel. "I love it here," she says, adding that she is considering the possibility of making aliyah.

"I feel so welcome here, so safe here, so at home here, and for now, I can't imagine leaving."

She only wishes more of her friends in Canada would come to Israel. "Every Jew in Canada should come here at least once," she says. "In fact, every Jew should experience Israel at least once, at an age where they are old enough to understand it."

As for her extraordinary Israel experience, Anbar says "I got to meet a lot of people I otherwise wouldn't have met, I got to stay in Israel longer, and I met a great guy. All in all, it's been the best experience of my life."

YU launches 'Center for the Jewish Future'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Kenneth Brander spent 14 years in South Florida as spiritual leader of the Boca Raton Synagogue, overseeing its growth from 60 to 600 families.

During his tenure, he helped establish two satellite congregations and was involved in building a new "campus" that included a mikvah, a high school, and a youth and senior centre.

But on Sept. 1, he assumed an undertaking of much broader scope when he became dean of Yeshiva University's new Center for the Jewish Future (CJF).

The centre, which has an annual budget of $6 million (US), which comes from grants and private donations, aims to "help transform the global community," said the 43-year-old rabbi in a telephone interview from his New York office last week.

Rabbi Brander

Already, he said, he has had inquiries about the centre from Europe, Australia and Israel.

Its approach is six-pronged, with half a dozen departments focused on developing the next generation of rabbis; supporting rabbis; partnering with communities; community initiatives; enhancing Jewish day schools; and leadership training. The centre will also organize special projects that address contemporary challenges in the Jewish community.

Among its eight faculty and staff members are ex-Montrealer Rabbi Josh Joseph, director of special projects; and Rabbi Jacob Schachter, the centre's senior scholar and YU professor of Jewish history and Jewish thought, as well as dean of the Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik Institute from 2000 to 2005.

Already, said Rabbi Brander – who also teaches at YU's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary – the centre has run a retreat for 50 North American rabbis, and rabbis in Israel have expressed interest in a similar program.

Partnering with communities includes providing resources for outreach to college students and young adults, and there have been inquiries from Toronto, he noted.

"We have a multi-disciplinary approach," he said, noting that the centre has access to YU's "constellation" of graduate schools including the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, and Wurzweiler School of Social Work.

The CJF will also benefit YU itself, said the rabbi, who grew up in New York and was ordained at the modern orthodox institution. "By bringing the different talents together – being involved in this cross-pollination – we also improve the quality of education within the university itself," he said.

He cited a new in-depth program beginning this week for young rabbis to teach them about infertility and Jewish law, and related medical procedures. The one-year program will offer an additional level of certification as a rabbi, he said.

Another CJF program, called Tzelem, will put together a team of mental health experts and educators to create a program for teachers of brides and grooms.

"Most of the teachers are very special rebbitzens, but they have never been formally trained… You could go to one rebbitzen and be taught A, B, C and D. Another one might just teach A and B."

The program would cover issues such as sexuality, infertility and "awareness of what is an appropriate relationship with a spouse, and what might not be."

Discussions are also under way about a pilot project for high school students that would address relationship issues.

The centre's approach represents "a modern Judaism that does not compromise on Halachah, but is still open to society and the world," he said.

Corruption seen in high office

Israelis consider Ariel Sharon and his son to be among the most corrupt elected officials in the country, a poll found. According to the study conducted for an economic conference held in the southern town of Sderot last week, Israelis named the prime minister as the fifth-most corrupt cabinet member, and his son Omri Sharon as the most corrupt lawmaker. Topping both lists were members of the ruling Likud party. By contrast, Israelis named the Labor party's Isaac Herzog as the least corrupt cabinet member and Shinui party chief Yosef Lapid as the least corrupt lawmaker.

'No more land for peace'

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will no longer operate on the principle of "land for peace," but rather "independence for security," a top aide said. The idea that Israeli land concessions would buy peace, which underpinned the Oslo process, has been proven mistaken, Eyal Arad told the Guardian newspaper. If he's re-elected, Sharon will follow the "road map" peace plan, which Sharon believes lays out an alternative philosophy of "security for independence," meaning a "total end of the terrorist war" in return for a "Palestinian national home," but not necessarily in all of the West Bank, Arad told the Guardian.

Jihad commander surrenders

The commander of Islamic Jihad in Jenin surrendered to Israeli troops last Thursday after a day-long siege. Iyad Abu Rob was on Israel's wanted list on suspicion of being involved in several terror attacks, including the Oct. 26 suicide bombing in Hadera that killed six Israelis.

Hezbollah bodies returned

Israel transferred the bodies of three Hezbollah terrorists killed by the Israel Defence Forces in cross-border fighting last week, in what the army called an effort to "create calm" on the Israel-Lebanon border following the Lebanese government's "urgent request to do so." The handover took place through the Red Cross and the United Nations.

Hamas talks tough

Hamas said that at the end of the year it would not consider itself bound by a "truce" declared by Palestinian terrorist groups. "The group will not be committed to any agreement until we reach a new agreement after the parliament election," Hamas spokesperson Sami Abu Zuhri said, referring to a Palestinian Authority vote scheduled for Jan. 25. After declaring a ceasefire with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last February, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas persuaded Hamas and other terror groups to scale back their attacks until the end of 2005. Israel did not consider itself party to this agreement.

Bronfman Jewish Education Centre, Montreal is seeking an

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

The Bronfman Jewish Education Centre (BJEC), FEDERATION CJA's central agency for Jewish education, is committed to ensuring the Jewish future of our community by connecting our generations to their Judaism, the Jewish People and the State of Israel. To translate this vision into reality, BJEC provides a wide range of services, community funding and programs to Jewish schools and the community at large. Through the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre, BJEC administers our community's Israel Experience programs. As well, BJEC seeks to further extend experiential learning to other areas through new initiatives.

Reporting to the president and BJEC's lay governing structures, the Executive Director of BJEC is the professional head of the organization charged with the overall responsibility for its operation. As such, the Executive Director provides inspired and expert leadership to further the organization's vision and mission and to initiate activities to achieve them. Specific responsibilities include: strategic planning; financial management; financial resource development; advocacy for Jewish education; leadership development; representation and liaison with pertinent local, national and international organizations; hiring and supervision of staff; and working in close collaboration with lay and professional leaders in the educational community and at FEDERATION CJA.

The successful candidate is a creative and effective leader with: at least 10 years of relevant work experience; proven credibility to advance BJEC's vision for Jewish education; knowledge in Jewish texts, history, tradition and ability to articulate it; demonstrated skills in community organization, building community collaboration, planning, management, fundraising, financial accountability and personnel management; commitment to Judaism, the Jewish People and the State of Israel; university degree in either education, social work, Jewish Studies, management or equivalent; oral and written communication in French and Hebrew would be an asset.

Please send your resumé with a cover letter by e-mail, outlining your suitability for the position by January 31, 2006 to:

Jacob's Ladder Foundation holds fundraiser at Carlu

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jacob's Ladder Foundation was formed in 1998 to find treatments and ultimately a cure for neurodegenerative diseases.

The foundation holds its third annual family fun day, Holiday Funtastical, on Dec. 4 at the Carlu in College Park in downtown Toronto.

Eight-year-old Jacob Schwartz was born with Canavan disease, a rare fatal genetic condition that causes progressive mental and physical disabilities. There is no known cure.

Children with Canavan disease are unable to sit, crawl, walk, eat or even speak.

Jacob's parents, Ellen and Jeff, led in the creation of Jacob's Ladder Foundation, which has so far raised more than $1 million to advance the research of neurodegenerative diseases.

Since its formation, the foundation's mandate was broadened to provide funding for a cure for all neurodegenerative diseases, including Tay Sachs, familial dysautonomia, Alzheimer's, epilepsy, Parkinson's and Huntington's.

"An exciting and innovative seed- grant fund has been developed between Jacob's Ladder and the Hospital for Sick Children," says Jeff Schwarz. "The Jacob's Ladder Foundation has agreed to make gifts to Sick Children's Hospital totalling $350,000 over the next five years. The money will establish the Jacob's Ladder Research Innovation Fund in Neurodegenerative Diseases."

Ellen Schwartz and her son Jacob

Ellen Schwarz says "the little miracles that each of us treasure help to keep things in perspective when we are faced with adversity and challenge. As Jacob's journey unfolds, it makes us recognize that life is filled with many small miracles that we may not fully appreciate until we view another's reality.

"Jacob is a testament to life's little miracles. He has surpassed his life expectancy by many years and is a strong, physically sound child. If you ever have the pleasure of seeing Jacob on his backyard swing, out for some air in the neighbourhood or surrounded by playmates and family, it is a realization that miracles can and do happen."

Jeff Schwarz adds that for Holiday Funtastical, the Carlu, one of Toronto's most beautiful and historical event halls, will be transformed into a fun-filled venue featuring a day of entertainment, including children's theatre, carnival games, clowns, music, magic and giveaways galore for children and adults.

Among the the day's events are a benefit performance of Second City's interactive musical romp, Big Bad Wolf, popular children's singer Kayla, Scotiabank Magic Money Machine, Mad Science Slime Lab, Loots' Party Station, Barbie's Dress-up Tea Party and Kids Spa, Indigo Story Corner, Starbucks' Beverage Patrol, Sony Playstation 2, and Beadology.

Tickets for Holiday Funtastical, on Dec. 4, are $25 each or $100 for a family pass for five. Tickets can be purchased at TicketKing, 416-872-1212 or www.ticketking.com. Babies in laps are always free.

The Menorah

The delicious smell of frying latkes enveloped Tali as she stood by the window, studying the waiting menorahs. The big, shiny one was Daddy's. It was silver-plated, adorned with fine, intricate carvings. The menorah next to Daddy's belonged to Alexander, Tali's older brother. It was porcelain, and very fragile. Her favourite menorah was the next one over. Her menorah. She had made it in school, out of clay.

There was one other menorah on the windowsill, very different than the others. It belonged to Babushka, Tali's grandmother, who lived with them. Babushka means grandmother in Russian, and Babushka was born in Russia. The menorah was very small. Mommy said it was made of brass, but Tali couldn't tell, because it was so dirty and rusty that no matter how hard Mommy scrubbed it, none of the original color showed. Tali wondered why Babushka didn't get a new one.

There was a thump outside, and the door swung open. "Daddy's home!" shouted Tali, running to the door.

"Happy Chanukah, Tali," said Daddy. Along with his briefcase, he was holding something, wrapped in colourful paper. "I've got something for you."

"Ha ha ha!" exclaimed Tali.

"But not until we light the menorahs. Boy, it sure smells great in here!"

"Welcome home, Michael," said Tali's mother, smiling as she came out of the kitchen. "How was your day?"

"Pretty good." He took off his coat. "So, are we ready to light the menorahs?"

"I'm just about finished with the latkes. Tali, go get Alexander and Babushka."

Tali ran up the stairs. "Alex, we're about to light! Mommy and Daddy are waiting!"

"I'm coming…"

Tali ran down the stairs, and knocked on the door to Babushka's room.

"We're lighting the menorahs now."

"Thank you, Tali. I'll be right there."

Babushka joined Tali and her parents by the menorahs and a minute later, Alexander did too.

Daddy slowly said the blessings, and lit the one candle in his menorah.

Alexander said the blessings a bit faster, and lit his candle. Tali proudly said the blessings and lit her menorah, and so did Babushka.

"What tune should we use to sing Maoz Tzur?" asked Daddy.

"The slow one," said Alexander.

"I want my present," thought Tali.

"I have to go check on the latkes," said Mommy, disappearing into the kitchen.

Alexander began singing Maoz Tzur.

But Babushka was staring at the dancing flame in her menorah, a far-away look on her face.

"Babushka, why are you crying?" asked Tali.

"The menorah looks so beautiful in the window, where everyone can see it."

"Where…where else would it be?" asked Tali.

"When I was a girl in Russia, we weren't allowed to do anything Jewish. Anyone caught teaching Torah disappeared to Siberian prisons and was usually never seen again. You couldn't trust anyone. Your neighbour could be an informer for the KGB. And if you were caught lighting the menorah…"

Tali listened intently, her present forgotten.

Alexander stopped singing.
